"Your editor seems to think that any woman may employ any means she can think of to get what she likes. No man is safe then, in making any plans for the future, in forming any home ties, in being industrious, devoted and upright with the expectation of securing happiness. He is a mere bird of passage, a creature to come when a woman beckons and to go when she tells him to. He may put all his energies into building a home nest, but if he is driven out of it when after long years it is finished, he must not complain. If he loves his children, as fathers sometimes do, it is but an added power of cruelty in the woman's hands, for 'the children belong by nature entirely to her.'

"I can't see the justice in this proprietorship of children. The arguments for this claim are that the 'woman made them from materials furnished her by nature!' But does she 'own' any of the processes or forces of nature; the growth and development of the child goes on independently of her will. Meanwhile, she must be cared for, loved, protected; be furnished a home, nourishment, doctors, nurses and assistants, and the father of her child whom she has chosen, usually supplies these things as I did gladly. She risks her life and she suffers. But in a generation or so of healthy, free women, she will not do this. In all this I cannot see that the child is hers by any natural or just law more than it is the father's.

"Usually there is a sort of tacit if not expressed contract between the parents of children. Few men would care to be chosen as mere fathers and housebuilders, if he could have no assurance that he had some rights to the children and the home, but could be sent away from them at any moment. It certainly is a sort of 'barnyard morality' when a man is chosen solely for the essential duty of propagation, with no share in the life-long consequences, no rights or pleasures of his children, his home and the companionship of the mother. The terrible growth of a long and slow civilization, has brought us thus far from the animals, to the social joys which accompany propagation; shall we go back to the old brute plane and eliminate home delights?

"And what of the children? Are they to have no voice in the matter? I do not believe in the ownership of human beings even by mothers. Mothers are sometimes cruel, often unfit and very frequently not the best guardians for their children. I do not know why they should be given unlimited control over their children's lives any more than other people should be accorded authority over others. As I believe in equal freedom, I believe the wishes of children should be regarded as soon as they are old enough to make any. Not that they should always be granted, but they should be taken into consideration."

Carl continued. "You remember I was awarded by a court of justice the privilege of seeing my children on Saturday afternoons. For a long time, I visited them on that day, they greeting me always with delight. There were certain taxes and assessments on the home at this time which the mother wished me to pay; I was under no legal obligation to do anything more as everything I had in the world had been handed over. She was very gracious toward me at this time, sometimes expressed regrets, appealed to me for sympathy, and at times talked as though we might yet live together but in some other place. She once charged me with 'destroying the integrity of her home,' though I had begged her not to have it destroyed, and the other party to the destruction was her closest friend. Finally, when the debts (which I paid) were canceled, all this ceased, and later, after she had read your former account, which she says is a 'tissue of falsehoods, the children were kept away from me even for the legal time on Saturdays.

"Yet, this is all in accord with the new order of 'freedom in love.' Well, if woman's freedom is to cost so much suffering to everybody else, I've no use for such a world—that's all. Can there be no such thing as equal liberty—justice? Must somebody always be the victim?"

And Carl turned away, a hard and bitter look on the face once so cheery and strong. There was nothing I could say in consolation.

Capitalism, Socialism, Imperialism, Cosmopolitanism.

BY R. B. KERR.

In No. 825 Henry E. Allen says: "I used to consider Kerr a pretty good Socialist, but since he has gone off on the Imperialist tangent I am in doubt. Imperialism and Socialism do not mix any more than water and oil." In the London "Clarion" of Aug. 4. J. Bruce Glasier, the leader of the Independent Labor Party, says:

"We must not, we are told, confuse Socialism and Anti-Imperialism. There shall be no confusion in it. Socialism is, and must be, as definitely anti-Imperialist as anti-Capitalist. What should not be confused is Internationalism and Imperialism—Cosmopolitanism and Imperialism—a confusion that has already confounded not a few amiably disposed Fabians in these latter days. Imperialism is Capitalism at large."

To clear this matter up, let me ask a few questions. First, is it true that Socialism is anti-Capitalist?

In one sense, yes. Socialism wants to substitute common ownership for ownership by individual plutocrats, and in that sense it is anti-Capitalist. But does Socialism regret the rise of Capitalism? Certainly not. All intelligent Socialists rejoice in the substitution of the trusts for individual enterprise, and in the substitution of great factories where hundreds work together for the old household industry. They rejoice for two reasons. The first is that the centralization of industry by capitalism will make it much easier for the state to take hold of each industry and run it as a government department. The second is that the ruin of the small capitalist or the small storekeeper, by converting him into a proletarian, will make it much easier to convert him into a Socialist. The Socialists have completely failed to convert the small peasant proprietors of Germany and France, who prefer the absolute ownership of a little plot of ground to an individual interest in the world; but they have made a clean sweep of the large cities, where the people have nothing to lose but their starvation wages. Capitalism is the link between Individualism and Socialism, the necessary intermediate step in evolution; and as against Individualism Socialism is emphatically pro-Capitalist.

So much for Individualism, Capitalism, and Socialism. Now let us examine three other ideas, Nationalism, Imperialism, and Cosmopolitanism.

What is Nationalism? Simply a kind of collective Individualism. The Individualist goes out into the west and stakes a piece of land. Some day thousands follow him, and build up a great city on his land. He says, "This is my land, and you must all pay rent for the use of it, or buy lots at the price which I demand for them." He stakes a mineral claim, and it turns out the richest gold mine on earth. He says, "This is all my gold, and the world must pay me its price for it." "Not so," says the Socialist, "you did not create these land values; the community created them; and the community should have the economic rent. You did not create the gold; it is one of nature's gifts to all men; and all men should have the benefit; paying you only a fair royalty for your enterprise in finding it."

Now Nationalism is only Individualism writ large. The Nationalist says, "My countrymen pre-empted this great tract of the earth's surface, and it is ours for ever. Long after we came here we discovered that we had the greatest gold deposits on earth. It was only a fluke, but it was our good luck. That is our gold, and all men must pay tribute to us for mining it, in one form or other."

What says the Cosmopolitan Socialist to that? "Stuff and nonsense," he says, "that gold is the common heritage of all men, and all men should share in it, after paying the miners handsomely, and giving a reasonable royalty to the finders." He further says that all men should have a right to come and live at these gold mines on equal terms, and have an equal share in the government of the country when they have been long enough to know something about it."

We have now discussed five of our six ideas. We have seen that Socialism is the opposite of Individualism, and that Capitalism is the link in evolution between the two. We have seen that Nationalism is only Individualism writ large, and that Cosmopolitanism is only Socialism writ large. One question remains. Is there an intermediate link between Nationalism and Cosmopolitanism, as there is between Individualism and Socialism?

There is the hottest political question of the day. There is the question that has almost split the English Fabian Society, and brought endless curses on the head of the gentle Blatchford.

But Glasier lets the cat out of the bag. He tells us that "Imperialism is Capitalism at large." Then I say Imperialism is the inevitable link between Nationalism and Cosmopolitanism, as Capitalism is between Individualism and Socialism.

We have seen that the peasant proprietor loves his little plot of land so much that it is useless to talk Socialism to him. We have seen that when he becomes a proletarian he becomes a Socialist. It is the same with the Nationalist. Leave him his little country, his peculiar language, his quaint prejudices, his conviction that his is the people specially chosen of God, and you will never make him a citizen of the world. Take these away from him, and you transform him from a Boer or a New York Dutchman into a man.

That is not theory; it is one of the platitudes of the historian. What created the Christian religion? The Roman Empire. When the Jews were a nation, they had a Jewish God, whose chosen people they were, and who had no use for any one but a Jew. When the Greek communities were independent, they had their own gods, who were not so bigoted as the Jewish one, but certainly none too liberal; and they called the rest of the world barbarians, and thought them only good enough to be made slaves of war. The early Romans had their own peculiar deities, to watch their interests. But when the Empire wiped all these little nations out, a Cosmopolitan religion arose, which preached salvation to all mankind, without distinction of Jew or Gentile.

Of course the transition is not made at one step. The Welsh man of today is as yet only a good Englishman, and in fifty years the Boer will be only a good Britisher, but by no means a citizen of the world. But it is far better to be one of 400,000,000, and have a quarter of the world for one's country, than it is to be only a Welshman or a Boer. Moreover, the big nations are always the most cosmopolitan in sentiment. It was England that first abolished slavery in all her possessions; England is the only country under heaven where a Jew, a Negro, and a Chinaman can all move in the best society; the English are the only people who spend more time in abusing their own country than in praising it; and absolute equality between citizen and alien has been more nearly realized in the British possessions than anywhere else. In short, England in time of peace is by far the nearest approach to a cosmopolitan country the world has ever seen.

The consolidation of nations has also greatly diminished the number of wars. The more nations, with their small prejudices and divers tongues, the more chances for a quarrel. When England was divided into seven nations, and Scotland, Ireland, and Wales into too many to count, they were fighting among themselves all the time, and the same is true of Greece, Italy, Germany, France, and all the other countries which were once divided into many little states. Even when nations go to war now, it is only a few of the men that fight, but formerly everyone was a soldier and always fighting.

But these beneficent revolutions are only brought about by the conflict of selfish interests. The selfish interests of Capitalism are the motive power that is driving the world from Individualism to Socialism, and the selfish interests of imperialism are needed to drive the world from Nationalism to Cosmopolitanism.

By the way, I see Lucifer credits me with the invention of a new word, "interpendence." It is such a good word that I wish to give the honor to whom it is due, viz, the printer. I used the word "interdependence."

Query.

If God is omnipotent and man is weak,
Why should we cringe his favor to seek?

He in his omniscience knoweth full well
Whether you'll end in Heaven or Hell.

And since he knows, it must be decided,
Were you ever next to a game so one sided?

So what use to pray, to beg and to flatter,
Do you think that such conduct will alter the matter?

Be a man amongst men, be to enemies just,
Don't whine, crimee or fawn, to a God so unjust

Who causes us to sin, and punishes us for sinning,
Who is no wiser now than he was in the beginning.

He'd punish us forever, for the sins that last a minute,
For tyranny and brutality, old Nero wasn't in it,

One by hand, the other by brain,
Which the more powerful of the twain?

Can you, honest, tell me true,
And I'll be obliged to you.

LABOR DAY PARADE.

Scarcely had the excitement of the Grand Army reunion in Chicago quieted down when another and but little less imposing public pageant was seen on the great city's thoroughfares. Monday September 3 was "Labor Day," not only in Chicago but throughout the United States of America.

Most if not all the labor unions of the city were represented in Monday's parade, which in point of numbers fell short of expectations—caused mainly it is said by the labor troubles here for many months past, by which troubles many unions have been more or less disorganized; many members having left the city in search of work.

By "actual count" the "Times Herald" says the number of marchers in line was 18,158; falling behind St. Louis, which city claims 25,000 in line. The same paper gives the number marching in 27 cities and towns at 163,166.

The most important features of Labor Day in Chicago this year were the speeches of Bryan and Roosevelt, one the Democrat and Populist candidate for president of the United States and the other the Republican candidate for vice-president. The Republican papers claim that Bryan took an unfair advantage of the occasion to make a partisan political speech, whereas Rosevelt confined himself to non-partisan issues. However that may be it is admitted on all hands that Bryan was the lion of the day, and received by far the greater share of attention from the assembled multitudes.

BUDDHISM IN THE UNITED STATES.

Comparing the methods of Christian and Buddhist missionaries "Occult Truths" has this to say:

"In the last eighteen years, Buddhism, one of the religions of China, has made 500,000 converts in America without having paid one cent to missionaries. My Buddhist teacher, Dharmapala came without money, never had any money while he stayed in this country and got back home without money. He never received a cent of pay for the quiet work he did here but the seed sown is bearing fruit in this magazine and in a hundred other directions. The power of truth in his soul was sufficient to drive out all money considerations. Not so the deluded and ignorant emissaries of the American Board of Methodism, and of fifty other isms which contest for supremacy in our midst to the stultification of them all. In spite of spending millions of money here and abroad, all these isms are on the decline. Even ignorant street preachers and fanatical Salvation Armies get a hearing and a following from people disgusted with churchism. The Christians hire the most eloquent and most unprincipled orators, like Talmage who got money for a church in Brooklyn under false pretenses and had three churches burned over his head. They pay thousands of dollars for organists, for solo singers, for paintings, decorations, cushions, marble tables, etc. etc., to entice patronage, but most sensible people shun them and go bicycle riding or trolley-car riding on Sunday. If they cannot do that they stay at home."

Having met Dharmapala and heard him lecture here in Chicago, I can testify to the truth and justice of the above statement in regard to the methods pursued by this eminent apostle of a religion that has never used force or violence in its efforts to secure converts, and which today numbers far more adherents than does any other of the religions of the world. If the Christian missionaries in China had followed the example set by the Buddhist propagandists there would have been no massacre of Christians in China and no Chinese war.

Truly the saying of Jesus is being fulfilled, when he said, "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth. I am not come to send peace but a sword."

In the Note and Comment columns of the New York "Truth Seeker" of Sept. 1, appears the following:

"Mrs. Lucy Parsons whose husband was hanged a dozen years ago for complicity in the Haymarket murders, was fined $50 last week for holding a meeting on the streets of Chicago and refusing to move on. The police and court seemed anxious to let her off lightly, but were forced by her defiant manner, the papers say, to make the arrest and impose the fine."

If this paragraph had appeared as a news item in the columns of any one of the papers that helped to secure the judicial murder of Albert Parsons, August Spies and their comrades, there would have been no cause of surprise or comment. Men who commit or abet crime in the name of "law and order," may be expected to defend their action and try to keep the public blinded by false presentations of important facts; but that a paper calling itself Truth Seeker should lend itself to this work of perverting the truth—for political or any other reasons, is sincerely to be regretted.

First. "Complicity in the Haymarket murders." If the man who writes the news items for the "Truth Seeker" is well informed as to the facts, he knows that it was not proved at the trial that any murder was commmitted at the Haymarket, Chicago, on the evening of the ever-memorable 4th. of May 1886. Murder is "homicide with malice afore thought," but the evidence showed that the dead policemen met their fate while committing a criminal act—breaking up a peaceable meeting. Men are not usually said to be "murdered" when they themselves are the aggressors.

But this is not all. The evidence utterly failed to connect Albert Parsons and his friends with the man who threw the bomb that killed Deegan and mortally wounded several other policeman while engaged in their criminal act. How then was it possible that these labor reformers could be "hanged for complicity" in such homicide?

The simple fact is, or was, that these labor martyrs were deprived of liberty and life for their opinions and not for their acts. This fact was fully confessed by their prosecutors and persecuters, and by the judge who sentenced them to death, or to life imprisonment.

Second. "Holding a meeting on the streets of Chicago." The concurrent testimony of all the reports I have seen and heard of the arrests made on the afternoon of August 5, is to the effect that no attempt whatever, was made by Mrs. Parsons and her friends to hold a meeting in the streets when they were unlawfully and invasively prevented by the police from holding a peaceable meeting in the hall they had hired for that purpose.

As to "defiant manner," it is to be presumed that most of us would be tempted to express our opinions of such invasion in terms not the most guarded, should we be deprived of our citizen right to hold meetings in a public hall, for the use o which we had paid, and when we had neither committed a breach of the peace—nor even contemplated such breach.

No report is given of the words used by Mrs. Parsons, and thus we are left to infer that the prosecution was hard pressed for an excuse to justify their owa criminal act, especially when we remember that defiance in words is not a crime under any rational administration of justice, and that none but judicial Dogberrys punish people for honest "contempt of court!"

Once more: If the charge had been true that Mrs. Parsons had attempted to hold a meeting in the public street, since when has it been reckoned a crime or a misdemeanor to do so? How many of the numberless and very noisy street meetings of the Salvation Army have been broken up by the Chicago police? And what of the uncounted and countless crowds of people that collect on the street corners to listen to political place-hunters, or to patent medicine vendors, or to itinerant fakirs of every name and nationality?

And what of the legend, what of thetradition, still believed in by many, that this is a land of "equal rights for all and special privileges for none!"

All this is said not because the writer of these lines is a partizan of Mrs. Lucy Parsons or of the men whose mortal lives were sacrificed, Nov. 11, 1887 to the Moloch of aggregated capital and to the governmental superstitions that make such aggregations possible. What I have said in defence of Albert and Lucy Parsons and their friends I would say in defence of any or all who are or might be the victims of invasion by the appointed and paid servants of the people, whose business it is to see that all citizens are equally protected from invasion of person and of property earnings.

Woman and the Home.

Whether I am the "editor" spoken of by L. L. C., in "More About Men's Rights" I am left to conjecture, as no names are mentioned. Inasmuch, however, as the article was given to me for publication, and inasmuch as its main purpose seems to be to antagonize, in a general way, the doctrines I have advocated in Lucifer, the inference is reasonable that I am the person meant.

If so, let me ask, where and when have I said that "any woman may employ any means she can think of to get what she likes?" Instead of advocating any such doctrine I have always contended for the utmost candor, frankness and honesty between woman and man. If I have claimed greater privileges for woman than for man in the matter of reproduction of the race, it is because I prefer justice to injustice; because I would have equity instead of inequity (iniquity). Privileges should be measured by duties, responsibilities, labors, pains and perils, and in these regards nature has put by far the greater load upon the shoulders of woman—in reproduction—and therefore simple justice—equity—would accord to her the greater share of privileges, saying nothing of rights, since many of our readers seem not to believe in rights of any sort.

Lack of space will prevent an elaborate reply to all the points mentioned in the revised statement of the wrongs suffered by Carl Jager at the hands of his late partner in business and conjugal companion. Briefly as possible I would say that while I do not sit in judgment upon and condemn either of the parties mentioned, will say that if I had treated another as Jager says he treated his wife I would think the punishment received was justly earned. The man who "hands over" to his wife, to his child, (or to anyone else,) "everything he has in the world," as Jager admits he did—unless the circumstances be very extraordinary indeed, does his wife or child, as well as himself, a serious injury, and deserves all that he is apt to get in the way of punishment. The surest way to ruin a child is to give it unlimited and irresponsible use of money or property, and the same applies to a wife or to anyone else.

Self-justice, or justice to self, is the first and most important of all the grades or kinds of justice, if there be different kinds or grades. If we fail in this; if we allow ourselves to be defrauded invaded, despoiled, we may naturally expect soon to have little if any power or means with which to do justice to others. To submit to wrong is to encourage wrong doing and therefore to wrong the invader as well as ourselves.

"BARNYARD ETHICS."

It is fashionable in many quarters to try to disparage the doctrine of Love in Freedom—including of course the self-ownership of woman and also the ownership by the mother of her infant offspring—by references to "barnyard morality" and the "stockbreeder's" methods.

Speaking for myself alone I accept this challenge, fairly and honestly. Yes, I gladly welcome the issue and would say in all candor that the comparison is decidedly favorable to our humble and despised kinsfolk, the beasts and the birds. I agree emphatically with Dean Swift when he makes his "Houyhnhnms"—horses that reason—say that in the treatment accorded to their females human beings are below the brutes; and while it is true that the stockbreeders' aim is a low one—mere money getting usually, he obtains much better results than the average output of the priest-and-judge-controlled system of human propagation, supplemented as that system is by the shrewd bargaining of thrifty parents whereby the young prospective mothers of the race are sold to the degenerate heirs of baronial titles, baronial acres or of fat bank accounts.

In passing through crowds of people, such as were recently seen in Chicago, who has not had running through his brain unbidden thoughts like these:

"Job lot! job lot! Not made to order. Bought here and there wherever odds and ends could be had cheap! Not made by skilled workmen; not made upon honor or reputation of a reliable house, but made by careless and irresponsible apprentices or by 'scab' workmen."

How many ideal faces and forms do we meet in a mile walk through a dense crowd of average human beings—how many approximately perfect types of manhood or womanhood, padded and disguised as most of them are to make up for lack of symmetry? Some remind you of bean poles or guys; others make you think of the saying "every tub must stand on its own bottom"! Heads and faces that resemble those of hawks, eagles, foxes, dogs, cats, owls, monkeys, baboons, etc., etc.

Contrast this state of things found on the human plane with what we see among the higher orders of birds, geese and storks for instance, where perfection of type is the rule and not the exception, as with us. Where each individual—because of ages and ages of natural selection—has reached a plane of equality with his fellows, so that he—or she—is able to bear his full share of the burdens of community life; where each takes his or her turn (without compulsion) at the head of the triangular column as leader in breaking a path through the pathless fields of "desert and illimitable air," when the flock is migrating to or from the circumpolar regions, and where each takes his or her turn in standing sentinel while the others feed.

Yes, truly, would I have our human mothers take a lesson from the birds and beasts in a state of nature, not in the "barnyard" or pig-stye although even in the barnyard the prospective mother is usually mistress of her own person, not for one day or hour of her life but for every day and hour—take a lesson from nature untrammeled by Grundy rules of propriety or by priest-made laws; take lessons from nature not to slavishly follow but to improve upon them by using the advantage gained by conscious intelligence and a larger use of articulate speech than that possessed by beasts and birds.

HOME DELIGHTS.

"Shall we go back to the old brute plane and eliminate home delights?" asks L. L. C.

Taking lessons from the brutes does not mean going back to the brute plane, but as between brute morality in matters pertaining to reproduction, on the one hand, and priest-made morality, binding the mothers of the race to the code which says,

"Wives submit yourselves to your husbands in all things," and "Thy desire shall be to thy husband and he shall rule over thee"—the code which sinks the individuality, the personality, of the wife in that of the husband; the code that reckons the family pedigree and name in the male line only, and that gives to the father the ownership and control of children—as between these two I most decidedly prefer the first, or the morality of the beasts and birds. It is because I would have the home built upon the bedrock of justice and cemented by mutual love and respect, instead of upon the sands of superstition and cemented by injustice, fear and slavery, that I contend for woman's right to self-ownership of person, the ownership of her infant children and the ownership of her home.

While mutual love and mutual respect are the only bands or bonds that hold the pair together it will make little difference in whose name is recorded the title deed to the land upon which th building stands that forms the nucleus of the home, but when dissensions arise, or when the bonds of magnetic and psychic attraction that drew them together have lost their binding force, then the mother with her infant children should be lef, in quiet and undisputed possession of that home, whether paid for in the first place by money previously earned by one or both the parties or acquired in any other way. If this should seem to entail hardship upon him by whose efforts mainly the home may have been built, and if he should have little or no other property upon which to lean in sickness or old age, the most rational remedy for this will be found, as I think, in the co-operative home; the home in which each individual, whether woman or man, has her and his own personal rooms, own personal belongings, and also her and his equal share in the common property of the home—the halls, the library, the public parlors, the kitchen, the laundry etc., etc., together with courts, lawns, gardens, orchards, farms, factories and what nots that go to make the home an industrial and economic success.

For further elaboration of this solution of the "home" question, see the book "Cityless and Countryless World," by Henry Olerich, and also "Hilda's Home" by Rosa Graul.

Lack of time and space prevent further elaboration of the "Woman in the Home" question for this issue. If possible the subject will be resumed next week, when other points mentioned by "L. L. C.," Mrs. de Maupassant and others will receive a share of attention.

VARIOUS VOICES.

L. M.,—N. Y.:—Is it against the law for a woman to take a name not legally her own? I know the courts can change a name; can they make one legal already adopted through a simple contract marriage? Would a marriage be legal if the woman married again under the name not legally her own?

[Will some reader answer?]

N. H. Harman, Inglenook, Calif.:—I sent you a dollar for your autobiography, with regrets that I could do no more to help you in your great struggle to give light to the world. There is no doubt in my mind that you advocate the first and chief reform that shall give mankind an upward lift to a better plane of living. I am at heart a socialist, pure and simple.

Jennie W., Bradford, Ohio:—Enclosed find one dollar for renewal of subscription. Only wish it was one thousand. But as wishes do not count I will send you what little I can. I will send you the dollar for your biography just as soon as I possibly can do so. But the paper I cannot do without. It drops many many flowers in my pathway, that lighten life's burdens. I have never read anything that can compare with Lucifer. It is so different from common literature, I know by what great efforts and by what superior brain capacities all this is effected, and this is why I appreciate the paper as I do.

Elisha Crawford, Orchard, Iowa:—Find money order for one dollar for the good of the cause. I have more books than I can read or lend. I think your cause is the very best. I am almost seventy-nine years old, blind in one eye and the other very dim.

[For nearly two decades of years Father Crawford has been a faithful friend and generous helper of our Morning Star and its work, and is therefore entitled to the fraternal sympathy, respect and honor due to age and useful labor well done. May his declining years be peaceful and happy, and may he live to see the fruits of his toil and of his generous giving. M. H.]

E. M. Dewey, Dimond, Calif.:—Can you tell me where I can get a copy of a poem I once saw in an old volume of Paine's "Age of Reason." The poem related to the conversion of "Mordecai the Jew" by a Catholic. The Jew had fallen through the ice as he was passing over a pond. A Catholic saw the accident and told the Jew he would like to help him out but could not unless he would renounce his religion. The Jew to save himself from drowning finally agreed, though under protest, to renounce Judaism and embrace Catholicism. Instead, however of helping him out the Catholic said, "Now as you are a good Catholic I will save your soul," and so, "in a thrice he popped Mordecai's head 'neath the ice."

[Can any of Lucifer's readers give Bro. Dewey the desired information?]

H. H. Cady, Nelson, N. Y.:—I send you three dollars and eighteen cents for which send me Lucifer another year, one dollar. Also the Light-Bearer Library for two years, (from the beginning) one dollar; also "Songs of the Unblind Cupid," thirty cents; "The Ballad of Reading Gaol," ten cents; "The New Hedonism," five cents; "Bar Sinister and Licit Love," twenty-five cents; "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs," twenty cents; "Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses," fifteen cents; "When Love is Liberty and Nature Law," ten cents. The article you published from "Physical Culture" entitled "Nudity and Purity," meets my approval. I think people should go naked as much as possible when exercising so as to harden the skin and render it less sensitive to changes of temperature. I think this would help very much to prevent colds, catarrh, consumption and other diseases of like nature. By wearing clothes we become like vegetation growing under a board—pale and weakly. I am sorry to see some of your subscribers get discouraged and drop out along the way. The task which you have undertaken is a large one and you need all the encouragement you can get.

Caroline de Maupassant, Otter Lake, Mich.:—The number 824, July 26 of Lucifer contains an article of Elsie Wilcox on Dr. M. A. Stewart's lecture, "The Great Deliverance." This article has, in part, my full approbation. I believe with Elsie Wilcox that to consider "reproduction as the chief end of woman is to place her on a level with the stock breeder." Hence my repulsion, I should say aversion for the method proposed by Mr. Harman in "Motherhood in Freedom" for the improvement of the race. Yes, there are hereditary traits reproduced in every child but education may rectify them.

Elsie Wilcox says: "Women should be free from sexual slavery, simply because they have an inalienable right to freedom." Here then she dissents from Mrs. Stewart's essay the central thought of which is: "Christianity, the glory of God, and the subserviency of the present to the future." No free minded woman can accept Dr. M. A. Stewart's creed. You cannot serve two masters—slavery and freedom, at the same time; therefore I cannot join Elsie Wilcox's prayer: "Anything, O Lord, anything that can awake thought in the creed-bound slaves of superstition is welcome."

There is no possible compromise between truth and error. The belief in a religion founded on tradition and systematically excluding science is the negation of progress, and consequently condemns humanity to revolve forever in the same round o bigotry, ignorance and hypocrisy. Instead then of joining Elsie Wilcox's prayer, I would say: Truth alone can redeem humanity, hence the first duty of rational beings is to look for Truth.

Lizzie Holmes says in Lucifer, May 26th. "Equality is good enough for all human beings, it is good enough for any true woman and mother." Let us therefore be contented with it. "Qui trop embrasse mal etreint."

F. W., Mitchell, S. Dak.:—My understanding of Lucifer's philosophy enables me the better to unravel the kinks in my own domestic affairs. It enables me to realize "Where I am at," how it all happened and the remedy. It also enables me to comfort and assist others who have domestic unpleasantness. A few days ago, I was called by a young wife to assist in dividing property; she saying herself and husband had parted. I talked to them from a Lucifer standpoint, and they are still living together and apparently as well off as ever. The lady is reading Grant Allen's books. My friend W. P. W., thanks me for persistently driving Lucifer's ideas into him, and says they are the best consolation he receives and he intends to make you a personal visit. For some good reading, see Stetson's "Women and Economics," page 257. Read and draw a subject for an article. My notion is, the following is good and practical: Educate the young and unmarried in the philosophy of economic independence of woman, freedom in love, baby farming, etc., etc. Before lovers set out to reproduce their kind, having full faith in each other, let them submit to the marriage ceremony and immediately thereafter enter into written stipulations in duplicate, setting forth the explanation that they submit to a marriage ceremony merely as a matter of policy, so as to legitimize the unborn children. That they agree each to claim no marital rights over the other; each to share justly the expense and care of offspring; each to live economically independent of the other; neither to claim alimony, and each to live and be as perfectly free as though a marriage ceremony had never been performed.

"The economically dependent woman, spending the accumulating energies of the race in her small cage, has thrown out a tangled mass of expression, as a large plant throws out roots in a small pot. She has crowded her limited habitat with unlimited things—things useful and unuseful, ornamental and unornamental, comfortable and uncomfortable; and the labor of her life is to wait upon these things and keep them clean."

Charity, Capital and Industry.

Adorned in the latest style, her elegant figure and lovely face a herald or proclamation of taste and refinement, Sweet Charity was one day passing down the avenue when suddenly she came upon Industry lying beastly drunk in the gutter, just able to drag himself upon his elbow to swear at a well dressed gentleman by the name of Capital who was passing by in a stylish tournout. Sweet Charity and Capital exchanged hearty greetings, agreed that Industry was in a shocking state of demoralization; tossed him a "quarter" to "sober up" on, and then congratulated one another that their names had been so changed by act of legislation that nobody would ever suspect them of being son and daughter of that same loathsome wretch in the gutter, or that they were the chief beneficiaries of his unwilling bounty.—The Straight-Edge.

Three Months for Ten Cents.

In order to get our monthly magazine, the Light-Bearer Library, into the hands of people who would probably read and appreciate it, we now offer to take subscriptions at the merely nominal price of ten cents for three months, hoping and believing that a large proportion of these trial subscribers will renew at the expiration of that probationary period, and become permanent helpers in the field of reform to which Lucifer and the magazine are devoted.

To all readers of Lucifer who have not yet seen a copy of the "Library" we will send a free sample on application.

How many of Lucifer's old-time workers will help us in this matter? A very little effort by each reader would double, triple or quadruple our present list of Library subscribers within one month of the present writing.

As a special premium to the sender of the largest number of ten cents subscribers to the Library we will send a very finely bound volume of "Hidden Secrets Revealed; the Curtain Lifted," by George N. McLean; a medical and hygienic work, with an introduction by Wm. L. Garrison. Full morocco, full gilt, illuminated binding. Price $2. Time of awarding the premium September first of this current year.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed?

Many other kindred questions are considered and interesting facts cited. Price five cents. For sale at this office.

Mill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. 1 00

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. 1.00

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy. .05

What The Young Need to Know: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages. .10

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages .15

When Love is Liberty and Nature Law. By John Badcock, Jr. "What I claim is, that those who desire to manage their own love affairs without consulting the state shall be allowed to do so." Paper covers scarce .15

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Paper covers 50 cents, Cloth. 1 00

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. 1.00

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL GUESSES.

BY E. C. WALKER.

No man is wise enough to foresee the secondary results of any proposed restriction, and no history is copious enough to record the evils that have ensued upon denials of liberty.—George E. Macdonald.

THE EDUCATION OF THE FEMININE WILL.

BY MLLE. HARLOR.

"To be able to reason and to have pride is superfluous for one who has only to obey. . . . Reason is the liberator of conscience"—p. 7.

"Not only is it necessary to claim economic emancipation; it is necessary to preach moral emancipation at the same time and with equal fervor. It must be said that the first without the second would be three-quarters barren, and that the decisive revolution is the inward revolution. . . . Resignation is the perpetual avowal of impotency."—pp. 9, 11.

A wonderfully clear and strong exposition of the demands of awakened womanhood—by a self-reliant, self-respecting woman.

Price three cents each; per dozen for distribution twenty five cents.

Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness who addresses humanity.—From the Preface.

The British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 50 Carroll Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound 50 cents; cloth, $1.

A PHYSICIAN IN THE HOUSE.

A New Family Medical Work, by Dr. J. H. Greer.

This book is up-to-date in every particular.
It will save you hundreds of dollars in doctors' bills.
It tells you how to cure yourself by simple and harmless home remedies.
It recommends no poisonous or dangerous drugs.
It teaches how to save health and life by safe methods.
It teaches prevention—that it is better to know how to live and avoid disease than to take any medicine as a cure.
It is not an advertisement and has no medicine to sell.
It has hundreds of excellent recipes for the cure of the various diseases.
It has 16 colored plates, showing different parts of the human body.
The chapter on Painless Midwifery is worth its weight in gold to women.
The "Care of Children" is something every mother ought to read.
It teaches the value of Air, Sunshine, and Water as medicines.
It contains valuable information for the married.

This book cannot fail to please you. If you are looking for health by the safest and easiest means, do not delay getting it It has eight hundred pages, is neatly bound in cloth with gold letters, and will be sent by mail or express, prepaid to any address for $2.50. The Fatherland.

Where is the true man's fatherland?
Is it where he by chance is born?
Doth not the yearning spirit scorn
In such pent borders to be spanned?
O yes! his fatherland must be
As the blue heaven wide and free!

Is it alone where freedom is,
Where God (Good) is God and man is man?
Doth he not claim a broader span
For the soul's love of home than this?
O yes! his fatherland must be
As the blue heavens wide and free!

Where'er a human heart doth wear
Joy's myrtle-wreath of sorrow's gyves
Where'er a human spirit strives
After a life more true and fair,
There is the true man's birthplace grand,
His is a world-wide fatherland!

Where'er a single slave doth pine,
Where'er one man may help another—
Thank God for such a birthright, brother—
That spot of earth is thine and mine,
There is the true man's birthplace grand,
His is a world-wide fatherland!

Science and Common Sense.*

BY GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.

I have now had some three centuries' experience of life. By this I do not mean that I have discovered the elixir. I am merely an ordinary vegetarian still in my fifth decade. But I was born on the outskirts of an Irish city, where we lived exactly as people lived in the seventeenth century, except that there were gas-lamps and policemen in tall hats. In the course of my boyhood literature and music introduced me to the eighteenth century; and I was helped a step further through the appearance in our house of candles that did not need snuffing, an iron-framed pianoforte, and typhoid sanitation. Finally I crossed St. George's Channel into the decadence of the mid-nineteenth century England of Anthony Trollope, and slowly made my way to the forefront of the age—the period of Ibsen, Nietzsche, the Fabian Society, the motor car and my own writings.

Put the question, what have my three centuries taught me about my own species? I reply, mainly to regard men's principles as excuses for doing what they want to do. Why do they shrink with such an exquisite shyness from asserting their will as valid in itself? I do not know: the shyness seems as fundamental as the will itself: no man is bold enough to take a questionable step without representing it as the fulfilment of a divine behest, or the logical conclusion from ethical principles of supreme authority. You meet a respectable citizen, for example, who drinks brandy or beats his children heartily. You ask him why. If he were to reply simply that he enjoys both practices, you would be shocked and set him down as no gentleman. Therefore he tells you, with a martyred air, that he is compelled to drink brandy for the sake of his digestion, and that he chastises his offspring, feeling every blow himself more than the child does, because he cannot bear untruthfulness. The one thing he will not do is to reveal himself in his own nature, and confess that his principles, his politics, his religion and his morals are all mere superstructure, founded on his native impulses, and unsettled only in so far as the Balance of Power changes as between these impulses by their waxing and waning.

Further, I have come to believe that the scientific speculation which calls itself the Law of the Conservation of Energy is actually a law as regards human credulity. There is clearly a given quantity of critical energy (a very small quantity) at the disposal of mankind. If any of this be applied to a subject which has heretofore escaped it, an equivalent quantity must be withdrawn from some other subject which has hitherto absorbed it, and concerning which the race instantly lapses into abject credulity.

Thus, whilst in my earlier centuries the Bible was introduced to me by my teachers as a talisman which would stop bullets if I carried it on the field of battle (bullet-dented Bibles were actually exhibited in the tract shops), and protect me from ghosts if I kept it under my pillow, I have lived to see it criticised, revised and placed, as ancient literature, on the footing of any other literature, with the full concurrence of archbishops. I even occasionally find people reading it and learning something from it; a thing impossible in the old times, when the repetition of its verses was a mere telling of beads, hypnotically comforting to the old, and an effective punishment for the young.

At first nobody noticed how promptly the Law of Conservation began to act, because nobody dreamt that the supply of critical energy was limited. But it was; and every ounce of it that was applied to the Bible and to religion had to be withdrawn from Science. When the process began, Science was Science, and Religion was Witchcraft. Now that it is ended, Religion is Science, and Science is Witchcraft. I can speak of this with authority; for the change took place in my mind as it did in the mind of the world. It was long before the terrible suspicion smote me that the new wine had been provided by emptying the old bottles. Not, indeed, until "the higher criticism" had done its work so fully that its conclusions became a mere habit of my mind, involving no real activity, was there energy enough released to enable me to resume the old seventeenth century work of criticising science.

Then, at last, I realized how abjectly we, the critics of religion, had become the dupes of science. Neither priest, pope, nor prophet could impose on us; and yet the most superstitious visionary, by merely calling his dream biology, or bacteriology, or physics, could make us shut our eyes and open our mouths to miracles that Lobengula or Cetewayo would have ridiculed. You could not persuade us then that a blind Syrian was ever made to see by touching his eyes with clay; but any young gentleman in spectacles, with his eyes too close together, and his head prematurely bald, could, after sacrificing a number of rabbits and guinea-pigs in a manner which would have made an ancient Roman augur blush, get himself accepted without question, not merely as a healer of individual patients in the apostolic fashion, but as the extirpator of their diseases for all time from the list of human ills. The number of diseases I have seen mended and ended in this manner in my day is quite remarkable. Small-pox, epilepsy, hydrophobia, consumption, bubonic plague, old age, goitre, diphtheria and enteric fever; science has removed them all; and as for wounds, they heal at a touch of carbolic acid. Who, after this, can read with any patience the puny miracles of scripture? Why is the Registrar-General allowed to spread absurd reports that people die of these diseases much as they did before? How dare the newspapers keep on reporting deaths from enteric fever in South Africa, when we all know that our troops have been inoculated against it with an infallible prophylactic?

The truth is, your ordinary man cannot reason, or perform any other skilled mental operation. He reads books and hears speeches in which philosophers and orators give him striking examples of the way in which merciful men, through error of judgment and defect of practical knowledge, have taken measures crueler in their consequences than the cruelties they aimed at ending; and, conversely, of apparently stern measures that have finally lightened the burden of human suffering. But your ordinary man does not really follow the argument; he simply forms an association of ideas between mercy and mischief, cruelty and profit. When this association becomes fixed as a mental habit, he calls it a generalization, and imagines that he is thinking every time he falls back on it to save himself the trouble o thinking. Presently the scientist comes along and says to him: "My friend, by a diabolically cruel process I have procured a revoltingly filthy substance. Allow me to inject this under your skin, and you can never get hydrophobia, or enteric fever, or diphtheria, etc. I have even a very choice preparation, of unmentionable nastiness, which will enable you, if not to live forever (though I think that quite possible) at least to renew in your old age the excesses of your youth." The ordinary man jumps at the bait. He regards the scientist as another Hamlet, "cruel only to be kind" (cruelty having come to be to him the most likely way of achieving a kind result); and he is saturated, as the advertisements and Holloway Colleges of our patent medicine mongers show, through and through with a belief in miraculous cures. As to filth, science has taught him that dirt is "only matter in the wrong place." It has not taught him that disease is only matter in the wrong condition, and that to inject matter in the wrong condition into matter in the right condition (healthy flesh, to wit) is to put matter in the wrong place with a vengeance. Neither has it taught him that on any possible theory of evolution those powerful instincts by which men recoil from certain transpositions of matter as filthy, and which carry the race from piggery to cleanliness (cleanliness, by the way, is "only" matter in its right place) must have a sanitary function, to be disregarded at our peril.

The doctor who writes a letter to the "Times" implying that, thanks to vivisection, the victims of some dreaded disease have but to call at his address to experience the beneficence of science and be convinced of the ignorance and mendacity of its traducers, reaps a considerable harvest of two and three guinea fees before the victims of that disease turn in despair from his door.

But why should a man deceive us as to the composition of the atmosphere and the shape of the earth? Ten years ago I no more doubted that I was breathing nothing but nitrogen and oxygen with a trace of carbon than I doubt that the sun will rise to-morrow morning. The "trace of carbon" was conclusive; it cut off all retreat by implying that there was not even a trace of anything else. But I reckoned without the reluctance of the "man of science" to say "I don't know." The fact that the old formula was an imposture would never have been discovered had not somebody discovered argon in the atmosphere, and insisted on the others finding room for it, and confessing (or pretending) that they had known all along that the old formula was incomplete. How any physicist has been able since that disgraceful day, to look the public in the face is more than I can understand. Now that the gaff is blown, the show given away, the scientists have become reckless. They own that the earth, formerly described by them, in their precisionist jargon, as "an oblate spheroid" (I believed it as I never believed the first chapter of Genesis), is an object probably resembling a two-penny loaf in its general outline, and has no pretension to rival an orange in symmetry. Then why did it say it did?

Can no man, when once he is given the entire confidence of the world, refrain from abusing it? There have been moments when the whole faith of Christendom was staked on the truth about the shape of the earth. Merely because it was plausibly held to be a spacious floor roofed with a starry dome, the men of science, at the risk of being burnt, declared that it was like an orange. They were staking their lives, not on the truth, but on the fancy of a greengrocer as against the visions of St. Augustine and Dante. The greengrocer was shamefully victorious; and we, poor fools! thought we were the more enlightened, and read Draper's Conflict between Religion and Science with the firmest sense of superiority. The greengrocer having had his turn, it is now the baker's; and I dare say I shall be excommunicated by Science for refusing to believe the two-penny loaf theory. Al the same, I do not believe it. I have found out the man of science; and in future my attitude toward him will be one of more or less polite incredulity. Impostor for impostor, I prefer the mystic to the scientist—the man who at least has the decency to call his nonsense a mystery, to him who pretends that it is ascertained, weighed, measured, analyzed fact.

I wish I could claim immunity from the great scientific delusion for the Humanitarians. But I cannot. No vegetarian can. Vegetarian scientific humbug is not wicked, like that of the Metabolists who have starved so many dogs to death in order to be able to assure us positively that "during starvation the output is greater than the intake," and that if the process is continued long enough the animal will grow weaker and finally die. But it is almost as silly. Why, I ask, are we vegetarians ashamed of our instincts? Why, if we prefer a clean and humane way of feeding ourselves to a nasty and cruel way, may we not say so, instead of raising foolish amateurish arguments about nitrogen and hydro-carbons and the rest of the figments of the science of "metabolism." Has mankind ever been plagued with such an idle babble as the wranglings of the people who, because they want to eat meat, are bent on proving that they want to eat it, and would die, or be eaten by the Boers, without it, and the vegetarians who, because they do not want to eat meat, are bent on proving that meat is the cause of all disease, decay, immorality, and finally of death? What is more certain in the world than that there is nothing to choose between these rival contentions in point of glaring falsehood and pigheaded insensibility to every day experience? I have not the slightest doubt, myself, that a diet of nice tender babies, carefully selected, cleanly killed, and tenderly cooked, could make us far healthier and handsomer than the haphazard dinners of today, whether carnivorous or vegetarian. The great incidental social benefits of the trade in baby-flesh were pointed out long ago by Swift, whose demonstration of them has never been refuted. There is no objection whatever to a baby from the nitrogen point of view. Eaten with sugar, or with beer, it would leave nothing to be desired in the way of carbon. My sole objection to such a diet is that it happens to be repugnant to me. I prefer bread and butter. This preference has no reference whatever to the relative richness of baby and bread and butter in hydro-carbons or uric acid or any such stuff. My father lived as long on calves and lambs as I am likely to do on lentils and haricots. The Tartar and the Gaucho, devouring eight or nine pounds of horse flesh a day and nothing else, the Tipperary peasant living on potatoes and buttermilk, the Chilian miner with his beans and the Chinese boatman with his rice, seem to get on equally well, though they are all scientific impossibilities. Mr. Herbert Spencer declares that the manifest inferiority of the herbivorous animals in the Zoo to the carnivorous ones puts vegetarianism out of court. Dr. Anna Kingsford, pointing to the same establishment, proclaimed the same superiority of the elephant to the tiger as putting an end to the controversy. What nonsense it all is!

In short, then, my proposition is that the world remains as dependent as ever, in the technical sphere, on knowledge founded on practice. Knowledge is what we know. Science is the whole fascinating body of speculation concerning what we do not know. The fact that science claims with absolute conviction a special and sacred infallibility of its own which distinguishes it from the superstitious of the augur and sooth-sayer, the medicine man and witch doctor, the faith healer and medium, the yogi and lama, the priest and parson, is the conclusive proof that it is generally identical with them, since they all make that very claim with that very conviction.

Further, I contend that in the intellectual or critical sphere the world remains as dependent as ever on a resolute objection to believe in miracles, and an unremitting vigilance in distinguishing the common and intellectually spurious conviction which is produced by the mere intensity of desire to believe—an intensity often amounting to a positive need for finding the thing true—from conviction founded on demonstration. This is a counsel of intellectual perfection, not to be wholly achieved by the coolest head and keenest brain; but it has at least the advantage of being relatively practicable.

And in the moral sphere, I contend that the world remains as dependent as ever on pure dogmatic, instinctive recoil from suffering on the one hand, and pure dogmatic, instinctive love of inflicting it on the other. Common to both these temperaments, and to the compound temperament in which they struggle for mastery, is the timid perception that society can only exist through a compact to live and let live.

Notes on Anarchy.

BY EDGAR D. BRINKERHOFF.

Etymologically and negatively, anarchy means the absence of government. Positively and by implication, it means the condition when government is absent. No true anarchist would attempt propaganda without first being prepared to describe the future as it will be without government. He must show that government is not necessary for the supply of material wants, of intellectual wants, of political wants. He must show that all these wants can be supplied without government. He must show how defense is possible without government. He may recognize the large amount of utility and the small amount of aggression in various political systems for defense, and at the same time advocate one in preference to the others. The one he advocates is the Anarchist's political system par excellence. He proposes to impose this political system upon all invaders. He proposes to bring no coercion to bear upon non-invaders. We take the meaning all out of words when we adhere too closely to their etymological definition. See President Potter on this subject.

Ideally and theoretically anarchy is a condition of society in which government is entirely absent. But applied anarchy can not come up to this high mark, just as applied mathematics fails to realize lines and figures and measurements as defined and measured by the science of pure mathematics. Practical anarchy is a condition in which government is reduced to a minimum and so is perhaps not yet quite absent.

The free jury is practically, but not exactly, the community. This has all been explained by Blackstone, Herbert Spencer and many other able writers. It is not practical to wait for the entire unanimity of the community. Imbeciles and lunatics must be counted out, and sometimes cranks and even oddities. If an opinion is entertained by a very small minority, one of this minority is not likely to appear on a jury created by lot. But should one such appear, the only effect is to set the guilty free in this particular instance, while would-be perpetrators of the crime [act] can readily see that the next jury would in great probability convict; so the deterrent effect is preserved and the will of the vast majority is not wholly defeated. A jury selected by lot is very likely to represent the main diversities of opinion in the community. That it is not certain to do so proves nothing; sociology does not claim to be an exact science. Does any one know of a better system by which the entire (or nearly entire) community can voice its unanimous opinion?

Anarchists are evolutionists. They believe in the step by step method. They would deprive the State of one invasive function after another until all its invasions have ceased. Then there will be no state and no organized government. The last few steps in this process of deprivation are comparatively unimportant. Nearly all the advantage of anarchy will have been gained when the state shall have discontinued invading squatters, bankers, traders and lovers.

Advocates of complete liberty sometimes forget that there can be no such thing for all persons until all are perfect. Imperfect individuals must be circumscribed in their liberty unless you give liberty a very ethereal meaning.

The removal of organized government would greatly decrease the number of invaders. Still, many invasive individuals would be left for many years and centuries? What shall the Anarchist do during these years and centuries? Shall he refuse to defend himself from the invasive? If he adopts a system of defense, shall it be jury rule or (necessarily) something worse? After organized government is disposed of, it will be wise to let juries dispose of each individual governor as he arises.

A distinction could be made between anarchism and anarchy. They are two sides of the same thing. Anarchism is negative, its work is iconoclastic. Anarchy is positive, its work is constructive. Anarchism kills government, anarchy traces out that which takes its place. Anarchism bestirs itself to destroy the state; anarchy builds a new structure on each vacated site. While anarchism is busy with ultimate theories and ideals, anarchy stoops to engage in the process of cultivating a new world. Anarchism concerns itself with the end, anarchy employs the necessary means.

UNPROTECTED FEMALE CHILDREN.

Some argumentation seems to defy all reasoning. For example, the assertion that a murderer's person can be rightfully controlled by none but himself; the denial of the right of the mother to keep her female child away from the father or other man whose object is concubinage; the averment that the mother is not invaded when her child is enticed away; the claim that a child knows its own mind; the declaration that a free jury system exists today; the proposal to put two bosses in the home and neither of these to be boss, and worst of all the old guy denying the right of property in general.

Trenton, N. J.

O youth, thy eyes tell me all thy danger, better than thy words. Thou still seekest freedom. Thy seeking has worn thee out and made thee too wakeful. Thou wouldst be on the open height; thy soul thirsts for the stars. But thy bad impulses also thirst for freedom. He who is emancipated in spirit has still to purify himself. His eyes have yet to become pure. Ah, I have known noble ones who lost their highest hope. And then they disparage all high hopes. They then lived unabashed, gratifying temporary pleasures, and seldom laid out plans for more than a day. Once they thought of becoming heroes; men of pleasure they are now. A hero is a grief and a horror to them. But by my love and hope I conjure thee; cast not away the hero in thy soul! Maintain holy thy highest hope!—Nietzsche.

LUCIFIC—Producing Light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of Light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

THE PROMISED continuation of "Woman in the Home" is crowded out this week.

THE ADMIRERS of the truly great thinker and writer, Bernard Shaw will be glad to see reproduced in Lucifer one of this writer's later utterances. Though somewhat long, and occasionally bordering on the metaphysical, the reader who would keep abreast with current thought cannot afford to skip such articles as that which appears on first page of this week's issue.

OCTOBER is the time set for the trial of Messrs. Moore and Hughes, of the "Blue Grass Blade." Read the article of "Jamblichus" in this issue, and if you can do anything towards helping to secure the triumph of freedom of speech and of press in this case, send your contribution to M. J. Cunning, treasurer, 614 Race St., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Dr. Juliet H. Severance.

A brief call at the home of this well known pioneer in the work of Woman's Emancipation, as well as of all other reforms, revealed the fact that Dr. Severance has been confined to her room and bed for some two months last past. Her trouble is caused primarily by an injury received from a fall some years ago, and from the effects of which she was believed to be slowly but surely recovering. Dr. Severance is the author of several pamphlets that have had a wide circulation, and which deserve a still wider appreciation. Chief among these is the discussion between David Jones, editor of the "Olive Branch," and herself, on the "Social Question"; or a frank and fearless comparison between the doctrine of freedom in love, on the one hand, and conventional marriage on the other, as a basis of morality and hygiene in the home life and the reproductive life of women and men. The price of "The Social Question" is fifteen cents; but in order to get this very superior missionary document before people who are now inquiring for the better way and the higher and truer life, and at the same time to assist Dr. Severance in her long and brave struggle to regain health, we will send from this office "The Social Question" and two other pamphlets of hers, "Life and Health, or How to Live a Century," and "A Lecture on Religious Political and Social Freedom," all three for twenty-five cents, post paid.

Though not requested to make mention of her illness we have reason to believe that Dr. Severance would be glad to hear from her many friends, and to receive calls from them at her present address, 6118 Drexel Boul., Chicago. M. H.

THE TEXAS STORM.

The terrible news from Galveston and other Gulf coast towns remind us of the predictions made by Joseph Rodes Buchanan and published in the "Arena" some ten years ago. The lesson to be derived from this almost unprecedented disaster would seem to be, "Build your habitations on high ground, and away from the treacherous sea."

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

"We dare not trust the government with any more power, cries Talmage; trust the people. So we say, trust the people. Make the government subservient to the people and then invest it with plenary power. We have no notion of giving more power into the hands of the government, Brother Talmage, until we, the people, instead of the trusts, own the government and this is what Government Ownership and Direct Legislation mean—that we are the government and the government is ours and directs our affairs at our bidding."—Coming Nation.

From Lucifer's standpoint it is utterly hopeless to expect that the people and the government can be one so long as the people are composed of the masses and the classes, as now. By the masses I mean the producers—the farmers, the mechanics, the artizans, the wage-earners—the real wealth-producers. By the classes I mean the non-producers of wealth, such as the bankers, or money lending class; the rent-taking class; the lawyers—including judges, legislators, law-executors, such as presidents, governors, sheriffs, policemen, detectives, recorders, treasurers, etc., etc.; also the armies and navies in government employ; also physicians and clergymen who have no other occupation than their professions; also lecturers, editors and writers of books, who do nothing but talk and write; also merchants and traders of the speculative class whose labor, such as it is, adds nothing to the sum total of real wealth, or whose scheming does nothing towards effecting an equitable distribution or necessary exchange of wealth.

It is true that the line dividing the masses from the classes is not always clearly defined—or definable. It is true that a man may be a farmer, a day laborer and also an interest-taker, or a rent-taker. Another man may be a physician, a lawyer, a lecturer or a teacher and be also a farmer or mechanic. But these are the exceptions, and the tendency of our social system is constantly in the direction of a more clearly defined division of mankind into wealth-creating masses on the one hand and wealth, consuming classes on the other, and just so long as this division exists just so long the government will be run in the interest of the classes and not of the masses—just so long the government will mean the classes and not the masses.

I once joined a co-operative enterprise something like this. A scion of a noble house in Massachusetts, a man of learning and family pride, but who had failed as a lawyer, came west and leased a large tract of pine lands for the purpose of making spirits of turpentine. Another scion of eastern nobility, put in a few hundred dollars to buy the "still" and other equipments. I was asked to join the combine and put in my labor as cooper and also a little money and personal influence to induce a few woodmen, my personal friends, to "tap" the trees and gather in the crude turpentine. I did so; my friends took hold; I paid them their wages, and put in my own labor, but when I asked for a voice in the management of the business I was given to understand that my part of the co-operation and that of my friends was mechanical only. That the management, the head-work, belonged to those who, doing no work themselves, could devote their time and their mental energy to supervising the work.

This, it seems to me, is a tolerably fair illustration of what government means. It means that the real wealth producers are to spend all of their time and mental as well as physical forces in the work of production of wealth, while the self-elected few take to themselves the business of governing the producers, and for their trouble appropriate to their our own use the lion's share of the proceeds of the labor of the masses; the burden bearing masses who have not sense enough to govern themselves nor to see through the tricks of the men who place burdens upon the backs of others, "heavy and grievous to be borne, but which they themselves will not help to lift with one of their little fingers."

From long study and careful investigation of root causes of social and economic ills, some of us have come to the conclusion that even "Government Ownership and Direct Legislation" will not lift the burdens from the backs of the enslaved working masses so long as we have the classes or gradings of human society, as we now have them; and further, that we shall continue to have these classes and gradings so long as human laws and customs are built upon our exclusive, indissoluble monogamic, priest-made marriage institution.

So long as woman the creator of the race, bases her claim to "virtue" and to "respectability" upon her adhesion to this code, just so long will woman herself be the most formidable foe to the most important of all human rights and privileges, the right and privilege of being well-born. Herein we have the origin and chief support of the division of human beings into the ruling classes, on the one hand, and the exploited and enslaved masses on the other.

Herein if found the chief reason why it makes so little difference what the form of government may be—whether monarchical, theocratic, democratic or republican—under all of these we find government in the hands of the few while the masses are robbed and enslaved.

Whatever the form of government priest-made monogamy defeats natural selection, and without natural selection there can be no approximation to that equality of endowment necessary to giving to each an equal chance in the race of human endeavor.

We may be "hobbyists" as some people are pleased to call us, but if so it is because the index fingers of all reforms—including that championed by the "Coming Nation," point in one direction—point to the reform or abolition of our priest-made marriage laws, as the basis of all other useful, helpful and healthful societary changes.

"RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF LABOR."

Printed in large type and very wide columns the Sunday Chicago "American," Sept. 9, gives as the first and chief article of its "Editorial Section" a sermon or lecture on this subject, by "Cardinal Gibbons." Attractively framed in the center of this editorial page appears the likeness of the eminent church dignitary himself.

The opening paragraph of the conspicuously honored editorial article reads thus:

"I say labor contributes to the prosperity of the country, and whatever conduces to a nation's welfare is most worthy of commendation. It is not the office or occupation that dignifies the man, but it is the man that dignifies the office.

'Honor and shame from no condition rise;
Act well your part—there all the honor lies.'

"Cincinnatus lent dignity to agriculture by working at the plow! Caligula, by an infamous life, degraded his crown and imperial purple. De Tocqueville could not pay a juster and more beautiful tribute of praise to the genius of our country than when he wrote in 1835 that every honest occupation in the United States was honorable. The honest, industrious man is honored among us, whether he work with his hands or with his brains, because he is an indispensable factor in the nation's progress. He is the bee is the social hive; he is the benefactor of his race, because he is always producing something for the commonwealth."

To say that "labor contributes to the welfare of the country" is certainly not an exaggerated statement. How would this lordly prelate take it if a working man were to say, "Religion—the work of priests and cardinals—contributes to the welfare of the country." Would he consider the work of his church and his occupation sufficiently honored? Would he not be reminded of Pope's sarcastic line:

"Damn with faint praise; consent with civil leer!"

Second. Is it true that "Cincinnatus lent dignity to agriculture? Would it not be more nearly the correct thing to say that agriculture lent dignity to Cincinnatus? Besides his occupation as a farmer, Cincinnatus, like Washington, was sometimes a soldier, or killer of men. That the business of killing people is more honorable than that of raising food to keep them alive, seems a fair inference from the language of this church dignitary.

Third. Is it true that to be engaged in honest labor was a badge of honor in the United States when De Tocqueville wrote his "beautiful tribute," and is it true now, that "the honest, industrious man is honored among us, whether he work with his hands or his brains," as stated by Cardinal Gibbons?

In 1835 DeTocqueville knew that in the southern half of the United States labor wore the badge of chattel slavery, and in 1900 Cardinal Gibbons knows that labor throughout the United States wears the badge of wage slavery. Are these badges tokens of honor? Is the coal-shoveler, the freight handler, the section-hand on the R. R., the deck-hand on a boat, the street-cleaner, etc., etc.,—are all these men honored because of the useful labor they do?

Fourth. "He"—the honest industrious man—"is the bee in the social hive; he is the benefactor of his race, because he is always producing something for the commonwealth," says this editorial writer in the Chicago "American,"

Very true as to the "bee in the social hive," but where does this simile put the Cardinal and such as he? If he is not a worker in the ranks of productive labor he must be either a queen—a mother bee—or a drone. Which of these does he claim to be?

But is it true that the laboring man is "always producing something for the commonwealth"? Reliable statistics show that the wage-earner gets less than twenty per cent. of the fruits of his labor, the remaining eighty odd per cent going into the coffers of the various non-producers; prominent among which non-producers are the clergy with their high salaries, their costly untaxed church buildings, their free parsonages and other expensive perquisites. If the "commonwealth" means the non-producers of wealth—the conscienceless exploiters and robbers of the working bees in the social hive, then Mr. Gibbons is correct in his statement; otherwise he is talking through the Cardinal's hat he so ostentatiously wears.

"A LIFE OF PATIENT INDUSTRY."

"A life of patient industry is sure to be blessed with a competence, if not crowned with an abundant remuneration. The great majority of our leading men of wealth are indebted for their fortunes to their own untiring industry," says this priestly editorial writer for the Sunday Chicago "American."

If this statement had been made fifty or one hundred years ago, there would have been some truth in it, but how is it today? In this same paper on the very next page after that on which appears the well-fed, sanctimonious face of the priestly adviser of the workingman, is seen a large picture representing a haggard, woe-begone family of three; a wretched looking mother with kerchief to her eyes; the father in rags is saying to the gaunt, half starved son standing before him.

"What will my boy do? Things have indeed changed. Your outlook is bluer even than when I began life."

In last Saturday's issue of the same Chicago "American" is an account of "A Big Coal Strike Sure to Come," in the coal fields of Pennsylvania, the chief source of supply of coal for New York, Philadelphia and other large eastern cities, as well as for the "middle west." Speaking of the grievances that cause the men to strike, the account gives the following by way of illustration:

"One skilled workman who was allowed only seventeen days work last month, though he was at the mine ready to work every day, after he had paid his helper and his powder bill had left for the support of his family just $22.50 for his month's work. And that was to be spent at the company's store, where prices are Klondikish. 'We might as well starve striking as working,' is the way half a dozen of them put the case."

Yes, things have indeed changed, since even middle-aged men were boys. Then the combines of the men who "want the earth" had not been perfected, but the Hamiltonian "imperialistic conspiracy," commonly called the Constitution of the United States, had laid the foundation of all the robber combines that are now driving the working masses to strike against further reduction of wages, and—sometimes to deeds of violence and blood.

These patent facts impeach the honesty, the truthfulness, else the knowledge of current events, of Cardinal Gibbons and those who with him say that a life of patient industry will secure competence, if not wealth, and that rich men are indebted for their fortunes to their own untiring industry. I should like to ask these Constitution-worshipers, how many rich men we would have among us today if it were not for the laws authorizing land monopoly, money monopoly, trade monopoly, thought monopoly—patents—etc., etc.

The learned and presumably pious prelate does not fail to advise—in a patronizing and fatherly manner, the workingman to "foster habits of economy and self-denial. . . Be content with your station in life. . . Be not eager to amass wealth. . . Sobriety will be an angel of comfort to yourself and family. While this virtue should be cultivated by all men, it ought to be especially cherished by the laboring class who are so much exposed to the opposite vice. Intemperance has brought more desolation to homes than famine or the sword, and is a more unrelenting tyrant than the grasping monopolist."

As some of us see it, the clergy would much better look at home, and cast the beams out of their own eyes, before lecturing the laboring class in regard to their vices. So long as working men see that the clergy are self-indulgent—as witnessed by their rubicund faces and protuberant stomachs—they will give little heed to lectures such as this.

As some of us see it, the clergy themselves are chiefly responsible for the miseries that afflict the poor and oppressed masses by denying to them—through the mediation, the imposition, of canon law marriage, denying to them the most important of all human rights, the right to be born well.

And some of us are disposed to predict that just so long as the mothers of the race submit to be led by the priests, and to be governed by priest-made morality, or rather *im*morality, in the matter of reproduction, just so long will the present inequalities, despotisms, slaveries and consequent crimes, vices and miseries prevail.

The August Library.

In answer to many inquiries we would say that "The Evolution of Modesty," by Jonathan Mayo Crane was mailed to subscribers last week. The delay occurred mainly in the bindery. If any subscribers to the Light-Bearer Library have not yet received the August number, or any other number, notice of the fact should be sent to us at once.

"He isn't paying her any attention at all."
"Indeed! Did she jilt him?"
"No; he married her."—Sel.

Cui Bono?

BY JAMBLICHUS.

There are few freethinkers in the United States who, during the summer just passed, have not had their attention directed to the prosecution of Messrs. Moore and Hughes, editor and publisher of the "Blue Grass Blade" of Lexington, Kentucky. These men are threatened with a trial in October on the charge that they have mailed "obscene" matter. The trial may come off or it may not. Should there be a trial these men will be acquitted or they will be convicted. If convicted one more will be added to the list of infamous judicial rascalities which have done so much to bring the distrust of the people upon our federal courts. These men have done nothing wrong. They have done nothing which they had not a clear right to do, and they have violated no law. The pretense of obscenity is the same fraudulent fake which was employed to compass the imprisonment of good old D. M. Bennett. It is one of the methods left over from the inquisition.

Messrs. Moore and Hughes have published a grotesque and satirical account of the birth of Christ which so effectually ridicules the idea that there is anything miraculous about it that priestcraft is alarmed at the exposure, and following the old methods calls upon the secular arm of the state to punish the distributors.

That the Freethought world is going to be powerfully affected by this persecution is manifest. That the ranks of the Freethinkers will be augumented thereby is certain. The policy of religion in these persecutions is suicidal, for while she has no thought but to retaliate revengefully upon those who have exposed her rottenness the very act of retaliation publishes and republishes with never ending reverberation the very fact she is most concerned to conceal.

But there are some Freethinkers who love peace, and being settled in their own minds are quite content to say, "What's the use?" "Why stir up the theological tiger again when we know the cruelties of which she is capable?" "Why do people write articles like that which has caused religious bigotry so much uneasiness?"

I want to say that there is a distinct necessity for just that sort of article, and such articles are of the highest utility, and it is unfortunate that there are not enough of such publications to thoroughly and effectually expose the monstrous claims of religion. It is because such exposures are too few that the various religions of the world have flourished upon the credulity of their dupes. As long as the priests of any sect pervert the purposes of Christ to their own profit just so long there is a necessity for protest, opposition, exposure. Mr. Grier Kidder's article on "The Virgin Mary" had that merit and that utility and it will open the eyes of many to the fact that if the religious teaching of the present day cannot withstand criticism and maintain its ground against intelligent opposition there is some thing faulty about it. This is entirely aside from any intrinsic merit which there may be in the publication itself, but the mere fact that it has angered the religious element to the point of this kind of retaliation (to the point of employing the methods of the inquisition to impose silence) is sufficient indication that it is really meritorious. However that may be, the attempted suppression will only result in the more wide-spread publicity for the inculpated publication.

Our Purpose.

Lucifer's work, Lucifer's mission, is to lay bare the hidden causes, the fundamental or underlying causes, of the prevalence of crime, of vice, of poverty and misery with which the race of humankind is now afflicted.

As some of us see it, the remedies recommended by our "Single Tax" reformers, our "Coming Nation," or Edward Bellamy reformers, our "Appeal to Reason" or State Socialistic reformers, our "Social Purity" or W. C. T. U. reformers, the state regulation of the liquor traffic reformers, etc., etc., are all more or less superficial and unphilosophic in their methods of social regeneration. As we see it, all of these zealous and well meaning workers in the field of humanitarian reform ignore and neglect, more or less completely, the basic cause of all human inequalities, oppressions and slaveries. All these workers seem to forget the axiomatic truth that the institutions, the laws and customs of any people are on a plane with the people who make them or who accept them from previous generations, and that hence the only rational way to get better institutions is first to get better people, and they forget that other axiomatic saying—"to reform a man we must begin with his grandmother."

This then is Lucifer's central mission, this is Lucifer's chosen field, namely, to rouse the women, the mothers of the race, to a sense of their responsibility in the work of social regeneration and to rouse the men, the fathers of the race to a sense of their responsibility in providing proper conditions to enable the mothers to do their perfect work.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Martin Nortvedt, Laurium, Mich.:—In No. 828 of Lucifer Francis B. Livesey says: "In some states 'S. H.' and 'Mr. H.' would be considered already married." I have heard before that such is the case, but have never learned what particular states these were, and should be glad if Mr. Livesey would tell us their names. Enclosed find stamps for the following: "Evolution of Modesty," five cents; "New Hedonism," ten cents; "Vaccination brought Home to the People," ten cents; "Under ground Russia," twenty-five cents.

J. A. Banker, Eveleth, Minn.:—Through the kindness of a friend I have been permitted to read many copies of Lucifer, and now wish to become a subscriber. I take several radical papers, but accept none as authority, believing that in all things the negation of authority is the first and most necessary step to advancement. Enclosed find $1; fifty cents for Lucifer six months, twenty-five cents for "Moribund Society and Anarchy," by Jean Greve; twenty-five cents for the "Chicago Martyr's." May the propaganda for freedom continue till all mankind (including womankind) realize that authority is not necessary either for the creation of life or for its continuation.

Dr. R. Stuckmann, Gottingen, Germany:—I wish to be informed whether there are any colonies in America in which freedom in love is practiced. I have heard of the Oneida Colony, but don't know whether it is still in existence, or has changed views—as I believe to have read somewhere. I imagine that you, the Lightbearer on sex questions might answer my questions the best and give me the best particulars about such settlements. Most of all I would like to know if foreigners would be accepted. I believe if America has not yet made those experiments it soon will do so—earlier than any other country. Am I right there? I feel very much obliged to you, noble advocate of free motherhood. Excuse my German-English.

Huldah G. Heacock, Vineland, N. J.:—I am in receipt of a little gem of a book, "Motherhood in Freedom," which I gladly accept as a gift from you and will see that it goes into homes where it will do the most good. I have eleven granddaughters and hope when the time comes for them to choose to become mothers they may be ready and able to practicalize "Motherhood in Freedom" in defiance of prudes and wicked laws and customs. Who can be so blind as not to see on all sides the curse—the legitimate fruit of matrimonial chains?

My faith in Lucifer's good work grows stronger every day—we must strive to reach the climax of purity and goodliness of liberty and love. Our good Comrade Fretz criticises Kate Austin, but how does he know "the law does not breed all criminals?" I hold the old legal marriage bondage responsible for the breeding of all the thousands who seem to go wrong from choice, and yet have their seasons of repentance and sorrow over the fact that they are the sad victims of that "innate cussedness" you noted. Independent individual freedom in all things and particularly in the business of "race building" could change human nature in a jiffy. Abolish the curse of marriage bonds and let human nature have a chance to live and develop its better qualities and then even the degenerate beings now treading the globe would be better disposed, and coming generations blest because born free and not the unwelcome burden of slave mothers. Yours for fearless social freedom.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed?

Many other kindred questions are considered and interesting facts cited. Price five cents. For sale at this office.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. 1.00

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. 1.00

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy. .05

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. .10

The Bar Sinister and Illicit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchestor case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers 307 pages. .25

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 64 large pages .15

When Love is Liberty and Nature Law. By John Badcock, Jr. "What I claim is, that those who desire to manage their own love affairs without consulting the state shall be allowed to do so." Paper covers scarce .15

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Paper covers 50 cents, Cloth. 1.00

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. 1.00

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL GUESSES.

By E. C. WALKER.

No man is wise enough to foresee the secondary results of any proposed restriction, and no history is copious enough to record the evils that have ensued upon denials of liberty.—George E. Macdonald.

THE EDUCATION OF THE FEMININE WILL.

BY MLLE. HARLOR.

"To be able to reason and to have pride is superfluous for one who has only to obey. . . . Reason is the liberator of conscience"—p. 7.

"Not only is it necessary to claim economic emancipation; it is necessary to preach moral emancipation at the same time and with equal fervor. It must be said that the first without the second would be three-quarters barren, and that the decisive revolution is the inward revolution. . . . Resignation is the perpetual avowal of impotency."—pp. 9, 11.

A wonderfully clear and strong exposition of the demands of awakened womanhood—by a self-reliant, self-respecting woman.

Price three cents each; per dozen for distribution twenty five cents.

Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness who addresses humanity.—From the Preface.

The British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound 50 cents; cloth, $1.

A PHYSICIAN IN THE HOUSE.

A New Family Medical Work, by Dr. J. H. Greer.

This book is up-to-date in every particular.
It will save you hundreds of dollars in doctors' bills.
It tells you how to cure yourself by simple and harmless home remedies.
It recommends no poisonous or dangerous drugs.
It teaches how to save health and life by safe methods.
It teaches prevention—that it is better to know how to live and avoid disease than to take any medicine as a cure.
It is not an advertisement and has no medicine to sell.
It has hundreds of excellent recipes for the cure of the various diseases.
It has 16 colored plates, showing different parts of the human body.
The chapter on Painless Midwifery is worth its weight in gold to women.
The "Care of Children" is something every mother ought to read.
It teaches the value of Air, Sunshine, and Water as medicines.
It contains valuable information for the married.
This book cannot fail to please you. If you are looking for health by the safest and easiest means, do not delay getting it. It has eight hundred pages, is neatly bound in cloth with gold letters, and will be sent by mail or express, prepaid to any address for $2.50. Address M. Harman, 507 Carroll Ave. Chicago, Ill.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. IV., No. 38. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, SEPT. 29, E. M. 300. [C. E. 1900.] WHOLE No. 833

The Cost and Joys of Liberty.

[During recent years, the formerly bitterly uncompromising sexual reactionary, "Saladin" (W. Stewart Ross), the poet and essayist, has several times given indications of a partial change of view on this most important subject. In his paper, "The Agnostic Journal," of London, issue of April 8, 1899, in his weekly "At Random" column, I find the subjoined stanzas, with the prose introductory paragraphs. E. C. W.]

"Woe be to him, and, more especially, woe be to her, who, with exalted aim and pure soul, follows where Nature, Beauty, and Poesy lead, and dares to defy the Flamen and Society! It is not so long ago I knew one who had, in her young womanhood, so dared. She was well-born. Her father had won distinction in arms, in literature, in philosophy; and kinsmen of hers are, at this hour, all over the globe, leading the soldiers of the Queen, and are to be found in both Houses of the Legislature. Her career, which she disclosed to me with guileless frankness, was, unquestionably, one calculated to shock Grundy to the uttermost, and yet the lady had the soul of the poet, the faculty of the artist, and was still young, and beautiful exceedingly.

"As she is not unknown to fame and as her life-motives have not been disclosed to all as they have been to me, chivalry (Saladin could have found a better word than chivalry) dictates that I should not here fill in the outlines of a picture that might disclose her identity. When I first met her she had intelligently, absorbingly, read some five or six volumes from my pen. 'The Poet's Address to His Old Coat,' in one of my small volumes of verse, had won her special admiration. Among a number of little momentos which she had brought me from a distant clime, she presented me with the jacket she had worn when seventeen, and asked me, on her account, and from her point of view, to apostrophize her old jacket, as years before, I had apostrophized my own old coat. The following lines, which she had originally printed for private circulation, are in evidence of my compliance with her request:

'O'd garment, in the years of yore,
My heart nigh burnt your breast away;
But never now, and never more,
Can dawn the hectic, ardent day
When Love's hot fingers touched my soul
And Rapture thrilled the morn and e'en;
For Law came second, Love came first,
And the red bud of being burst
To blossom at sweet Seventeen.

'There, where that crease is on your waist,
The arm of Godfrey circled tight,
And, to be blest, or to be chaste,
The die was cast that fateful night.
And all the gods but Eros died,
And amorous stars kept watch above
The silence of the slumbering hill;
And through the world there passed a thrill,
Caught from the throbbing pulse of Love!

'I've known the sober Reign of Law,
And all it takes, and all it gives,
The ghosts of which it stands in awe,
The shibboleths by which it lives.
But there's a Law that masters Law,
As high as heaven—what canst thou know,
Yea, higher than the heavens o'erhead,
And deeper than the hell below.

'When thou canst chain the rays of morn
From streaming o'er the orient plain,
When thou canst strangle Day, new-born,
And hurl it back to Night again;
Then Earth and Destiny above,
And all that flesh and fire implies,
Then, place thy impious chains on Love,
And, from our vision blot the skies,
And all that is of throb and thrill,
All that God is and Man may claim,
The Cæsar o'er the realm of Will,
Fierce pulsing in the pulse of flame.'

'Old garment of the sacrament,
A sacred vestment thou,
Though no bride-maidens with me went,
Nor orange-flower decked my brow—
Our bride-maids were the peering stars,
Our altar-lights their ray,
And Nature, who my father was,
There gave his girl away.

And fierce I struck, with rebel spear,
At Custom, in his mail,
And sought, by mount and moor and mere,
For Love, the Holy Grail;
But Custom's fangs are cruel and keen,
And Custom's arm is strong,
And Custom's might is vast, I ween,
Trenched in the forts of Wrong.
In the cold dust my sire lay down,
And she who bore me closed the door,
Each met me with averted frown;
I'd kith and kin no more.
My God had faded from the sky,
And snow lay on the altar-stone—
All, all was dead that new could die,
I'd Love and Hope alone;
But these strewed all my path with bloom,
And filled the world with Aidenn's streams
And flung an iris o'er the gloom,
And touched the woe with dreams
And visions of immortal Art
And Poesy and Truth and Fame.
And the rapt anthems of the heart
That issued forth in flame,

'And there was solace in the thought,
All scorn, all wrongs above,
That I had given all for thee—
For thee, immortal Love!
That I had trod o'er Man and God
In the realms of Good and Ill,
And trampled on each sacred thing
For thee, more sacred still!

'Yet, O it is a fearful thing
To swim against the tide,
Alone, ah me, on the Dead Sea,
Contemned and crucified—
Alone, ah me, on the Dead Sea,
Love's doomed and outcast Bride!

. . . . . .

'A gleam, a dream of orient trees,
Pagoda, grove, and flaming sky,
And perfume on the wanton breeze,
As if from breath of Araby,
And he, the knight of all my quest,
In rapture leant above me there:
At last my weary soul had rest,
I laid my passionate bosom bare,
And every pulse of being beat
Ecstatic to Love's master-lyre,
And flashed to heaven, wild and sweet,
The pinions of the soul on fire!

'I looked deep in his lustrous eyes,
I felt his heart beat wild o'er mine,
On the world's rim we'd won the prize,
The prize immortal and divine,
I'd found my soul's Sir Galahad,
And that true knight was mine,

'Old jacket, in that fierce delight,
Love's chalice running o'er,
His arm clasped where, that far-off night,

Young Godfrey's clasped of yore;
But far too pure this stainless knight
To find there taint and stain.
Where Love's own vestal fire had flamed
He lit it once again,
Nor deemed he, in his own pure soul,
The deed had left a stain."

Immoral Plays.

BY ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

An excellent article, by Allan Laidlaw, in "Westminister Review" for August, entitled "What are Immoral Plays?" should not escape the notice of Lucifer's readers. Of course we all understand that there is no such thing as an immoral play and I believe that Mr. Laidlaw really agrees with that view and that whatever of concession to a prudish morality he may make is simply a writing down to the estimated level of his readers. But he states wholesome truth enough to attract the attention and stimulate the thought of those to whom the question comes as a first impression, and for this he deserves thanks.

He takes up the oft repeated question "How do you explain the fact that if a play contains what are described as 'naughty episodes and 'suggestive' scenes it is pretty sure to be successful?" And he answers, "Because these things are fundamentally of the first importance to the affirmation of life and its continuance." He might have gone on to say that these things are not naughty at all, and that there is nothing vicious in the 'suggestiveness' which prurient prudes are always anxious to find in every act of other people, but he does say that,

"Deep down in the hearts of all of us there lies a secret conviction that the slave-morality is founded upon a false basis, a principle involving the annihilation and excision of passion instead of the affirmation, the controlling and spiritualizing of passion. Our modern morality is inverted morality."

He sums up thus:

"Here is the final point of our argument. Morbid and debasing plays and operas are, after all, only immoral according to the use or abuse of those who witness them, just as alcohol is to those who use or abuse it, they are even useful as an agent for the elimination of the unfit. For it is only by resisting such influences that higher natures can be evolved. Those who have not moral stamina enough to resist the stimuli of mere representation can never hope to attain such self-control as means mastership for conquering the direct and powerful onslaughts of debasing realities."

The article as a whole should be read by those who are watching the conflict between prurient conservatism and wholesome sexual progress, and Lucifer should make a note of it as well of all similar utterances, which appear with more and more frequency as enlightenment spreads among the people. By approving comment writers will be more and more encouraged to put these matters in their true light and to cut loose from our modern "inverted morality."

Comments.

BY C. F. H.

When James F. Morton of "Free Society," assuming superior knowledge of the money question, employed silence as an answer to my direct questions, in fair discussion, he did better than he now does in rebutting objections to his Lucifer sermons. Although he "abhors personalities" he alludes to the "ribaldry of C. F. H., Kerr and Leonard," without proving the ribaldry. This, one would say, is "mud-slinging," to use one of Mr. Morton's elegant terms, yet he "declines to participate in a mud slinging contest." Mr. Morton will not allow a plebeian grammar on his high plane. "Between all these," is the latest atrocity.

That a fire in the barracks of the Salvation Army in Cincinnati was discovered by a barkeeper may be regarded as one of the drolleries of Providence. Six children (God's poor) were burned, and it would have been worse only for the "barkeep."

Answering my assertion "Liberty is the anarchist's watchword, yet he denies a people the liberty to choose and maintain a ruler," "Free Society" says:

"Another Kerr come to judgment! The Anarchist demands the liberty of every man who wishes to be free. Those who do not, be they in never so large a majority, have no right to make their ignorance and servility a pretext for enslaving those who prefer freedom. But when government truly 'rests on the consent of the governed,' it ceases to be government at all."

One would infer that liberty is like a material object, a chunk of something the identity and nature of which can never be a matter of dispute. As a matter of fact, conditions which satisfy one person would be irksome and tyrannical to another. With this fact in view will Mr. Morton please try again?

I assume that the "Koresh" advocates are routed. Facts are too stubborn for their follies. Let any one view the north star and surrounding circular space of twenty-three and one half degrees radius, the north star being in the center, in which the stars never set in this latitude. These stars, according to "Koresh," ought not to be visible at all during a part of their circuit, being within the "invisible sphere." But we do see them, and the charlatan is nonplused.

The "Chicago America" says, the coal in the earth belongs to all the people equally, also that the people are oppressed and should vote for Bryan as a remedy; then pays a philosopher from Washington for his opinion that there is opportunity for all; that only the unfit meet with failure.

God, Government, and Kerr.

BY C. L. JAMES.

"The Bible tells us that the natural man is enmity against God; and what men once called God they now call Evolution."
—R. B. Kerr.

Then "Evolution" means just as much—and as little—as "God." Both must mean Everything in General; and Everything in General means Nothing in Particular. Evolution makes jingo; and "it is harder to kick against the pricks of Evolution than to obey them." But thunder and Mars! Evolution makes All Things i. e., It makes Nothing—any rather than It makes Whatever-Else you please. Evolution makes tigers, floods, tornadoes, thunder-bolts. Must we "obey" them? Guns, traps, sluices, cyclone-cellars, lightning-rods, are all so many kickings against the pricks of Evolution; and the beauty of it is that Evolution makes them too—flying in its own divine face, like all the precious creators whom their creatures made.

Evolution makes marriage. "And unmakes it too," perhaps Bro. Kerr will add. Of course!—but no more than Everything Else. You may be sure the unwashed male Amazons and the Strasburg geese were told that Evolution (or God) had been at much pains to "differentiate" them respectively from washed female Amazons and caters of livers which goose function is only to produce

I have sometimes fallen under the harrow of "liberal" anathemas for saying that I believe in God. I take this opportunity to declare my sincere impenitence; and to say so again—because I see no advantage in giving old ideas new names, "God," "Evolution," or what you will, is the Incomprehensible Reality, of which we all have some conception, but necessarily an inconsistent one, because we are finite and it is not. To ignore the necessity of such a conception is one error; to reason from such a conception is another. The functions thereof are not rational but emotional. Sweetly, in the hour of reverie, the soul reposes on consciousness of a source and end transcending her own little earth-born worries and perplexities; bravely, when thinking means hesitation, and the time requires action, does she respond to the sense of an "eternal power which makes for righteousness," and laughs impossibility to scorn! But once attempt to debauch emotion by impregnating it with theory, and you will find that, instead of a goddess, you have embraced a cloud which gives birth to nothing but monsters.

The god of Hannibal produces and devours all things. The god of Cromwell hates sin—and makes it. The god of Herbert Spencer makes society as it is; yet Herbert Spencer, I can inform Mr. Kerr, is so nearly an Anarchist as to have much difficulty in explaining what else he is. He hates jingo and imperialism. He has honorably set his face like a flint against the Anglo-American alliance, the South African and Philippine Island conquests. "Militarism" is his favorite term of reproach. He is utterly against Mr. Kerr's ideal of "society:" interfering between parents and children, "protecting" fools; perpetuating whatever cannot do that for itself; "preventing" everything objectionable, "from bad poetry to bad pickles." The deduction from his doctrine of Evolution is that mankind are made all they are good for by competition, which does not exclude, but involves, voluntary co-operation. The involuntary kind can not, indeed, he holds, arrest this beneficent process, but it interferes with and retards, and therefore is unmixedly mischievious (though obviously itself a part or product of evolution.)

Could there be stronger proof that evolution is a practical suggestion only when limited to particulars? That the idea of "universal" evolution, as of anything else universal, is no part of "the Baconian method of discovering truth by means of observation and experiment," but pertains to the older metaphysical method of taking a "view" far too general for any except emotional application? To know what each of these methods is worth and what it is not, is part of the art of keeping things in the right boxes—which is the art of life.

The merit of the Baconian method is that it teaches us how to do something. It is a "method of discovering truth," because the test of having got any (particular) truth is ability to apply the same. It is not a method of discovering the whole truth. There is no such method. The whole truth is unknowable. Our nearest approaches to it are only "views" representing Everything in General from some philosopher's standpoint, which, as soon as we attempt application, lead one disciple to Toryism, another to Anarchism. The Baconian method of discovering (some) truth is not, therefore, a means of ascertaining how we may be happy, still less how we can promote the greatest good of the greatest number, but only how we can succeed in what we choose to undertake.

If all men will seek to do for all as they do "for themselves, their children, and their friends" (probably) "the consequences will not be very serious." Does Chamberlain do so for the Boers? or McKinley for the Filipinos? Doubtless Aristotle did not for the slaves. But, as Mr. Kerr admits, he was an utilitarian. He thought it for the greatest good of the greatest number (the slaves themselves included), that those who could be enslaved should be. Just what McKinley, or his managers, think of the Filipinos. Nay, Aristotle has the advantage in comparison. He did not like slavery—only accepted it as an apparent necessity. He never thought that those who could set up a republic (like the Boers or the Filipinos) ought to be enslaved. On being shown a water-mill, he said, "This machinery will some day emancipate the slaves." If he had lived twenty-five centuries later, he would have said, with Karl Marx, that it will next emancipate wage-workers.

If we apply "the Baconian method of discovering truth by means of observation and experiment" to the issue between Social Democracy and Anarchism, it will teach us that Government never has been, is not, and never will be, anything else than a "microbe" in "the social organism" The pons asinorum of Anarchism is that no one takes the trouble to govern unless he wants to steal. Those who assume that "function" (for the money there is in it), necessarily, always represent, not the collective wisdom and virtue of the community, but its collective stupidity and rascality. The Government's parasitical vitality is simply in the organic relation of Rogue and Dupe. In its boasted sphere of protecting us against crime (particularly crimes of violence) it does evil, and only evil, and that continually. In our common desire (so far as it really is common) to eliminate crime, vice, ignorance, every anti-social passion and error, we shall find simply no excuse at all for the existence of legislatures, courts, judges, juries, lawyers, prisons, peelers, jailors, soldiers, hangmen. They are like our ancestors' sword and pistols—like the revolver some mullets still think it worth while to carry—recourses of barbarism, at once ruffianly and timid, which will be discarded, not in proportion as a few wretched degenerates learn to abstain from petty depredations but in proportion as the rest of us learn, what we are learning very fast, that there is more danger in such appliances than in the want of them.

All of which I am not giving at all as my opinion, but as the result of those inductive inquiries made by Herbert Spencer, Lombroso, Havelock Ellis, and other special students of such subjects. These eminent men do not call themselves Anarchists. The first is still badly befogged with metaphysics; the others remember that they "have characters to lose," and accordingly "cant about decorum." But they plainly lay down the major and minor of Anarchism, however they may hem and haw over the conclusion. In short, they are extreme Individualists. An Individualist is just an Anarchist without the courage of his convictions. Individualism is a sterile hybrid. Anarchism is a new species. Individualism is an artificial canal, whose projectors are always dredging and banking, for fear it shall dry up or break loose. Anarchism is a fountain with a hundred heads, which, though opened only yesterday, has fertilized a hundred intellectual deserts.

Not at all in anger, but considerably in sorrow, I would suggest to Mr. Kerr that he has, of late, neglected his true vocation. His allegories are excellent. But his science leaves something to be desired—unless, indeed, he has been joking; in which case the point is buried too deep. Ne sutor ultra crepidam. Let us have some more parables, exposing the absurdities of marriage.

Love vs. Adultery.

BY M. M. I.

That which is properly named love between the sexes is a drawing together of man and woman by inherent natural attraction, the male element seeking its corelative or complimentary female element, to the end that they may become one This corelation may and should begin in the soul of each, and finds its complete expression in the coming together of the two bodies. They are no longer twain but one flesh. This and this alone constitutes true marriage.

I know of a woman with two children, who is seeking a divorce from her husband. She alleges niggardliness or some equally surface symptom, as the cause. She tells her friends she does not love her husband—in fact had never loved him. She thought that love—mere sentiment—was not a proper basis on which to marry; that it should be a matter of reason or "common sense" as she termed it; and so she had given herself to this man in holy (?) wedlock. She had kept his house, ministered to his sex appetite, and—incidentally—borne him children; all this with no love or natural attraction for him in her heart.

That man and woman have been living in adultery, not marriage; in lust not love; and those children—God help them—were conceived in sin, and in iniquity did their mother bring them forth. And now when all the damage to posterity that two people can do has been done, the aid of the law is invoked to help them out of their miserable plight!

To commit adultery—in its last analysis—is to adulterate; to mix those substances which have for each other no affinity, no natural attraction. To adulterate food is to commit adultery—against the public health. And the man or woman who lives in the shame of a loveless marriage is living in adultery—against the very spirit of union and in adultery are their children born.

"Everyone that looketh on a woman—any woman—to lust after her—and all that is not of love is of lust—hath committed adultero with her already in his heart."

The Outlook.

THE COAL MINERS' STRIKE IN PENNSYLVANIA.

The latest and one of the greatest strikes of the year, if not of the century, is developing the usual characteristics. Beginning with the customary declaration that it would be conducted in a peaceful and orderly manner the apparently inevitable clash between the striking miners and the military arm of the government is adding one more proof of the futility of labor strikes so long as the employers of labor own the land or other raw material out of which, or upon which, the laborer must get his subsistence. When the workers (including the women and children) see hunger and cold staring them in the face they naturally become desperate, and pay little regard to the promises, or words of warning, of their leaders. And so long as "government" exists chiefly for protecting the "property rights" of the rich—as all human governments now do, just so long will the poor, the landless, the propertyless laborer fight a losing battle when he rebels against the oppression of his rich employer.

Whether the strike in the anthracite coal region was planned and is now engineered in the interest of the owners of the mines, and in the interest of the holders of heavy stocks of coal—in order to profit by the advance in the price of coal, (as is freely charged,) will probably never be known by the general public, but all the same this general public must suffer, and especially the poor in the great cities, because of this advance in price. But commercialism is remorseless, conscienceless, as the winds and snows of winter, or as the storms and floods that are now desolating thousands of homes in Texas and elsewhere.

"THE FULL DINNER PAIL."

This campaign slogan of one of the great political parties shows, all too clearly, how labor is viewed by those who manipulate the thing called government. A full dinner pail means a satisfied stomach. When his stomach is satisfied the government assumes that the laborer should be contented with the administration of public affairs.

And the saddest feature of it all is that the ruling classes are very nearly in the right when they assume that labor has no other wants, no other needs, than those of a merely animal or physical nature. So low in the scale of being are the vast majority of workingmen that they have little desire, little aspiration for anything higher than merely physical gratifications. For intellectual enjoyments, including the artistic and the psychic, they care little or nothing. Of the principles of right, of equity, and of real liberty they have little conception. The idea seems never to have entered their heads that under equitable economic conditions the "dinner pail" itself would be abolished That when the laborer gets the full reward of his labor a three or four hour day's work would be all that would be needed to secure the comforts, the luxuries even, as well as the necessaries of life, and that instead of carrying his dinner with him to be eaten from the tin pail in the damp, cheerless and unhealthy mine or amid the dust and grime of the factory, he could eat it at home, sitting at the table with his contented and happy because not over-worked loved ones.

"THE MAN IN A HOLE."

What then is the outlook—not only for the coal miner, but for all other laborers who are forced, by their artificial environment, or by the working of monopolistic laws, to accept service under a boss or starve? Is there any silver lining to the cloud that now shuts out the light of day for millions in this land of boundless material resources? The New York "World" of Sept. 20, in a brief editorial, under the head "The Man in a Hole," puts the case thus, in speaking of the situation in the mines of Pennsylvania:

"The World noted yesterday the significant fact that only 180 days of labor were permitted in the Coal Trust's mines last year, according to the recent report of the Pennsylvania Bureau of Mines. This fact cannot be too deeply impressed, because it is the key to the present situation not only in the coal region but wherever monopoly has extended its withering power under the protection of tariffs, discriminations, complaisant Legislatures and subservient Attorneys-General.

"To prevent a natural supply that would enable all to buy at reasonable prices, monopoly takes the tools from the workman and compels him to starve in idleness until the consumer, unable to endure the rise in price, ceases to buy, even though the article concerned is such a necessity of life as coal.

"If one man were to shut another up in a hole and refuse to give him food, no one would think of wagging his head wisely and talking of the 'unfortunate exigencies of economic law,' the 'cruel but unavoidable pressure of fixed charges upon wage-earners,' &c. The police would be called, the starving man would be released and his jailer would be jailed.

"Has not society—has not the State—done less than its duty in the coal regions?"

The "World" in these paragraphs tells only a part of the dismal story. Other apparently reliable accounts show that after the "docker" has got in his work; after the powder is paid for, and after all other deductions—such as the compulsory tax for doctors' attendance, whether the doctor has been called or not, the miner has often less than one dollar per day for his one hundred and eighty days work; out of which beggarly pittance he must pay house rent and feed and clothe his family; compelled to buy all his supplies at the "company store," where everything is sold at an advance of "ten to twenty-five per cent" above prices for the same articles elsewhere in the same town or county.

CHILD LABOR.

There are other features of the case not mentioned by the "World's" brief editorial. While there is a law prohibiting child labor in the mines this law is constantly evaded. Driven by cruel necessity parents lie outrageously in reporting the ages of their boys, in order to get them admitted to work in the mines, at fifty cents per day or less. The fact that from insufficient nourishment the children have a stunted and pre-maturely old look, doubtless aids in this deception.

To be deprived of a few years of existence, through hardship at the close of the average span of human life, would seem bad enough, but to be cheated out of childhood and youth, to become decrepit and prematurely old, in order to satisfy the greed of a few whose income is already so great that they must invent unnatural and unhealthful ways of dissipating it, would seem scarcely credible as occurring among people claiming to be civilized and enlightened.

THE REMEDY.

Evidently the "World" is a believer in state paternalism, or the power and duty of government—state or national—to interfere and compel the mine owners to treat their employes better.

In thus believing the "World" is not different from most of our politicians and writers on political economy. Both Republicans and Democrats, to say nothing of Populists and Socialists of all grades and types, all speak of curbing and regulating the power of the "trusts," the power of aggergated capital, when all know, or should know that aggregated capital owns and runs the government and has always done so and always will, so long as our present money system, land system and marriage system (which means property interests) remain in force. Who does not know that it is to protect property—in land, in money and in the souls and bodies of women and men—marriage—that government was invented and perpetuated? Who does not remember that it was Hamilton's motto—Alexander Hamilton, the father of the American Constitution—"Let the government take care of the rich; then the rich can take care of the poor?"

Well may the trust magnates laugh in their sleeves when any combination of men urge the government to curb and regulate the trusts!

To show that aggregated capital—accumulated wealth, owns and controls government we need not go back farther than the time of the great civil war. The slaves could have been manumitted without war, witness the experience of England and Brazil, if the trusts had so willed, but capital would not have it so. Who does not know that it was in the interest of capitalism that the war was precipitated and kept going years after it might have been ended? Capitalism wanted a strong central government, a large national debt, a large pension list, a government controlled currency, a larger standing army, and these things it could not get without war.

And what is it that provoked the war with Spain, when the end ostensibly sought—the acquisition or the freedom of Cuba—could with far less expense and no loss of life, have been obtained by peaceable means? And what is it that dictates the government policy in the Philippines and in China? What but the power of syndicated capital—the "trusts"?

And who or what is it that now divides the workers of this country into two vast armies, and causes them to spend enormous sums of money—all earned by the working people themselves, to say nothing of time lost and fraternal feelings sacrificed, in a prolonged conflict to see which of these parties can name the elective king of this country for the next four years?

Who but the trusts themselves who know full well that whoever wins this costly campaign of words and ballots the result will be practically the same? They know full well that the two principal departments of government, the Senate and National Judiciary, are already fixed for a long time to come, and that hence it makes very little difference who is the figure-head in the presidential chair.

Who does not know that the game of national politics is a howling farce, invented to keep the victims of Capitalism amused and their attention diverted from the real causes of their miseries, while the robber classes go quietly on with their schemes of exploitation and self-aggrandizement?

That there is a silver lining to the cloud I will not deny, but he that can see much that is encouraging in the present political, economic and moralistic outlook, must be an optimist—an optimist under all possible circumstances.

Humbert and Throttled Speech.

BY JAY FOX.

A king falls. Falls the victim of a system of human society he himself is largely responsible for maintaining. At once every petty ruler, pricked by the consciousness of his own misdeeds, cries aloud for vengeance upon the slayer.

The "worm turned" when Bresci, embodying the pent-up wrath of a people goaded to desperation by hunger and oppression, struck back at the cause of their wrongs.

Bresci was a worker—a wage-slave and "an anarchist," so they say. Compared to him Humbert was a god; a being who wore upon his head a sacred emblem; an emblem whose mystic power makes its wearer a privileged tyrant and millions his submissive slaves. Curse of the human race—symbol of authority, he wore a crown!

Bresci and his class are schooled from infancy never to do any killing on their own account, and they seldom do. But when it does happen that one of Bresci's class, forgetting his lessons and his duty to those whom divine providence has placed above him, shoots a tyrant—shoots a pampered lord, then press and pulpit, obedient mouth-pieces of the ruling class, give vent to their venomous spleen upon the heads of all men and women who hold progressive ideas, whether endorsing the killing or not.

At the time of Humbert's fall the people called Anarchists were the special victims of misrepresentation by all that class of men who sell their brains for a "respectable" living. At once these paid tools of the ruling class poured out a stream of vituperative abuse upon the adherents of that school of philosophy whose aim is the emancipation of all men and women from the necessity of having rulers, whether called kings or by any other name—the school of philosophy that inculcates the love of peace and harmony among men; the philosophy that would make war impossible; the philosophy that teaches human solidarity and brotherhood, and that would make this earth a fit habitation for men, women and children, not for kings and subjects, tyrants and slaves, as it is today.

But the removal of one man of mediocre ability, a man whose head has been deformed by a kingly crown, had sent a thrill of horror vibrating throughout the entire circle of rulers and exploiters that curse this planet with their malign presence. Had Bresci been purposely crushed beneath the wheels of Humbert's carriage, or shot to death by his tools—as were many of Humbert's subjects in the streets of Milan not long ago, for daring to ask for bread for their famishing wives and children—press and pulpit would have been silent. Such sport is the legitimate pastime of kings and rulers. So well known and so common is this killing of the subject class that we pass it by without protest.

Humbert's death is charged to anarchy, and that unpopular philosophy is now on trial before the general public, press and pulpit furnishing the evidence. Every reader and hearer seems fairly well satisfied as to what it means—simply the killing of kings and other rulers.

But what have Anarchists themselves to say? Will they speak? Yes, they ask to be heard in their own behalf. A meeting is announced. What will they say? Go and listen.

"But they may glorify the murderous act and pronounce Bresci a hero and a martyr."

Yes, they may talk thus, and then again they may not. But suppose they do? What of it? It is their constitutional right, anyway, since "freedom of speech shall not be abridged."

The time for the meeting has arrived. Approaching the hall the throngs find it surrounded by a cordon of police who have prohibited the doors to be opened.

Lucy Parsons, one of the speakers, arrives, and learning the situation crosses the street and mounts the steps of an unoccupied building, in the shade (the weather being very hot), to await the arrival of a friend. A crowd of policeman gather about her. She is struck; roughly hit on the shoulder and ordered to "move on." It is Captain Wheeler who thus addresses her. She protests; claims her right to stand where she is, since she is not obstructing the street.

The man with the gold-tipped star says "No," and Mrs. Parsons is pushed again. She sinks to the sidewalk, still protesting. While there she is kicked, and the gentlemanly captain threatens to "knock her teeth down her throat."

She is ordered to mount the patrol wagon; she says she has no desire to do so, and refuses to expend any energy in that direction, suggesting that if they want her in the wagon they will have to carry her there. A number of burly policemen throw her roughly into the wagon, she remaining passive.

A man in the crowd, touched by the brutal treatment of an innocent woman cries "Shame"! "Get that fellow!" shouts Wheeler, and the sympathetic offender is hustled into the wagon.

Another sympathizing spectator expresses his thought in words. The second man who cries "shame" is batoned on the head and face almost into insensibility. Two others are "chucked" in to make up the load—five in all, and once more Anarchy is "killed" in Chicago.

"The way to deal with these fellows," says Wheeler, "is to crush them everytime they show their heads."

Thus citizens who hold opinions different from those held by men in authority may be crushed summarily and with impunity for the invaders. The word of an arrogant policeman is law. It always has been law. Statutes are written only to amuse the electors.

Citizens are carted to jail for no offense, and one of them, Mrs. Parsons, is fined fifty dollars for her "crime." She has not paid it, however, and an appeal is now pending.

This outrageous action of the police—trampling under the iron heel of irresponsible authority the right of the people to freedom of speech, has roused the friends of liberty throughout the city. "The Free Speech League," representing some hundred of Liberal societies and Trades Unions, has been organized, and arrangements for a big protest meeting are now fairly under way. It is to be hoped a large down town hall can be secured.

Many prominent and able advocates of free speech have volunteered their assistance in making this protest so loud that the tyrants will hesitate before again putting a gag in the mouths of the people.

It is sincerely hoped the "Free Speech League" now forming will live as long as the need of its existence remains.

An ever increasing vigilance is necessary to retain the shadow of freedom we yet possess.

While the cause (authority) remains it is hard to keep the effect (oppression) in check.

In these reactionary times when militarism is sweeping the earth, and especially in our own country, it behooves every man who would not be an abject slave, to join the ranks of those who are keeping alive the spark of freedom that will one day be fanned into a flame so mighty that every throne will be wiped off the earth, together with every institution that has been reared in the name of authority—kingly or otherwise.

Story of the Flood.

BY ALBINA L. WASHBURN.

[This paper was read before the Woman's Alliance of Unity Church, Fort Collins, Colo., in June last. The pastor, Miss Mary Leggett, assigned to each member a topic in Genesis, mine being the "Story of the Flood." It was the only one read. Another member gave hers verbally. Another said hers was too bad to tell! A. L. W.]

In the sixth chapter of Genesis, in that ancient literary mosaic of history and fable called the Bible, it is related how the Lord becoming disgusted with the corruption in the earth had determined to sweep its inhabitants and their work away with a terrible flood, but wishing to save Noah and his tribe, gave him minute directions—the account thereof, beginning with the 14th verse—about building an ark in which he and his might take shelter from the coming revenge.

There are voluminous works in Hebrew concerning the exceeding great virtues of Noah and though he was the son of Lamech the idiot, and lived a bachelor until five hundred years old when he begat Shem, Ham and Japheth (presumably with the aid of a woman, who however, is not mentioned as their mother), Noah had ample time in the three hundred years after the flood for numerous works and died at the mature age of nine hundred and fifty years.

The ark which Noah builded for the saving of himself, wife and three sons and their wives, was about four hundred and fifty feet long, the breadth of it fifty cubits or about one hundred and fifty feet and the height of it, in three stories, about forty-five. There was a window and a door.

In addition to the family of Noah we are told that he was commanded to save a pair of all beasts male and female—also seven of each of the clean beasts, and fowls of the air; but of unclean beasts only the one pair. Noah and his family laid in provisions of all food that was eaten.

Seven days were they moving in, and preparing for the flood. This was in the six hundredth year of Noah's life and we are led to believe the old boy was but just in his prime. Not that it makes a particle of difference to busy people of these days, at least a million years after, who are concerned in the present and future of their brothers and sisters of the human race; but if we do look back it is well to be as exact as possible.

Thus in the second month and on the seventeenth day of the month in the six hundredth year of Noah's life, as we are told, the "fountains of the great deep were broken up, the windows of heaven were opened and the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights," and "the ark went upon the face of the water" which "prevailed upon the earth one hundred and fifty days" or five months, when God bethought him of Noah and sent a wind which dried up the water.

During the rain when all the high hills were covered, the water was about twenty-two and a-half feet deep; quite a precipitation from the dim past though little could be said for the infant hills; but the Ark found a resting place on the top of Mt. Ararat in the seventh month on the seventeenth day of the month. As the roads were quite muddy two birds were sent forth for news a raven and a dove. The former played "hookey" and sent in no report although the tops of the mountains (so-called) were visible, but only went to and fro.

The dove, however, going forth once a week found no rest until after bringing back to the ark an olive leaf when she departed to return no more, leaving her mate whose descendants may still be heard mourning for her. And so, on the first day of the first month of the six hundred and first year the waters were dried up off the earth, and Noah looked and behold the face of the earth was dry; but in the second month on the seven and twentieth day of the month the earth was really dried and thus ended the story of the flood.

In the ninth and succeeding chapters of Genesis those interested may follow the adventures of Noah and the generations succeeding; how he planted a vineyard and drank too much wine and how his three sons begat many sons; and their sons begat other sons to people the whole earth, no woman being mentioned, but according to Hebrew chronicles some later chroniclers noticing a discrepancy added that they begat sons and daughters.

Whether the story is "worth the while," with intelligent reading people of the present day who are somewhat familiar with the testimony of the rocks and the history of ancient peoples as revealed in the earth's genealogy; whether indeed any nursery tales are of value to adults except for amusing children, and even in that case, whether doubtful fables are as suitable as living truths, must be left to the decision of the thinking liberal parents of today. Yours story teller has but sifted the tale through the basket of her own views, after the bent of her own mind, and I pray you have mercy on her soul.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution, its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. VARIOUS VOICES.

F. W., South Dakota:—Questions for discussion: That the economic question, is the most important study before radicals today. That scores of liberal minded and noble hearted women are being held in legal bondage, and in public and private prostitution, for none other than economic reasons. That only by her education and environments, is woman less capable than her brother man for economic independence. That it becomes the personal interest, as well as human duty, for radicals to form local associations, for the discussion of all questions of interest, and especially with a view of educating woman to a degree o economic independence at least fully equal to that of man. That the only beneficial help woman can receive, is help to help herself. That it becomes radicals, like all other good citizens, to make the very best of life, taking conditions just as they are.

Wanted:—A pen picture of the practical ideal home, from a radical standpoint. Taking law, conditions and customs just as they now are.

[F. W., wants to know about the "Yoni Society." Who knows of such society? M. H.]

S. B. Benedictus, Selkirk, Manitoba, Canada:—Would you kindly answer the following questions:

First. Is it right to attribute those murders, such as the murder of King Humbert and the Queen of Austria, to Anarchists?

Second. Are these murders in accordance with the general movement of all Anarchists?

Third. Or do they belong only to enthusiastic ignorants of the class?

Fourth. What is Nihilism?

Fifth. Is there any difference between American and Russian Anarchism?

Will you also name me some short pamphlets (if any) on Nihilism, Anarchism, Spiritualism and Materialism? I want to get the idea quick; have not time to read big works. Enclosed find one dollar for the "Life History of Moses Harman."

[Very brief answers to these questions of Mr. Benedictus, editor of the "Selkirkischen," if sent us by Lucifer's correspondents, will be printed in the "Voices" column. M. H.]

Wonder Wild, Madison, Calif.:—I have been reading a friend's Lucifer and would say that I would like it much better if a "Hill Top" novel was in it. If you will be so kind as to keep a continued story in it I will pay double the price and will try to get you some new subscribers. The friend whose paper I read says you have let her have Lucifer on credit so long she does not know when she will get you paid. Now I will lend her my Lucifer, so you will not have to wait so long for her to catch up. You sell Lucifer at two cents a week. I will send you five cents for each week if you will put into it the "Old and the New Ideal," or the "British Barbarians." When my subscription runs out, please let me know. I want to pay in advance for every copy, and when I have a dollar I do not need to spend, instead of keeping it I will send it to Lucifer ahead of time.

[Enclosed with this letter was one dollar and twenty-four cents. This is by no means the first request that Lucifer should have running every week a continued story. What say our readers and patrons? How many are willing to pay two prices for Lucifer in order to get each week an installment of a good story? Or—what would be much the same thing—who will guarantee at least one new subscriber if the suggestion of Wonder Wild should be adopted? There is certainly much to be said in its favor. Grant Allen says, "Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness who addresses humanity?" Who knows that Allen is not in the right in thus saying? M. H.]

THE SOCIAL QUEST ON. A discussion between Juliet H. Severance and David Jones. The opposing principles are herein stated clearly and briefly. Valuable to those who want to possess the arguments of both sides of the question. Price 15 cents. "Life and Health, or How to Live a Century," by the same author. Price, 10 cents. "A Lecture on Religious, Political and Social Freedom." Price, 35 cents. A set, one of each, for 25 cents.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed?

Many other kindred questions are considered and interesting facts cited. Price five cents. For sale at this office.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. 1 00

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. 1.00

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy. .05

THE EDUCATION OF THE FEMININE WILL.

BY MLLE. HARLOR.

"To be able to reason and to have pride is superfluous for one who has only to obey. . . . Reason is the liberator of conscience"—p. 7.

"Not only is it necessary to claim economic emancipation; it is necessary to preach moral emancipation at the same time and with equal fervor. It must be said that the first without the second would be three-quarters barren, and that the decisive revolution is the inward revolution. . . . Resignation is the perpetual avowal of impotency."—pp. 9, 11.

A wonderfully clear and strong exposition of the demands of awakened womanhood—by a self-reliant, self-respecting woman.

Price three cents each; per dozen for distribution twenty five cents.

Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness who addresses humanity.—From the Preface.

The British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 507 Carroll Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound 50 cents; cloth, $1.

The Men Who Do Not Lift.

The world is sympathetic;
The statement none can doubt,
When A's in trouble, don't we think
That B will help him out?
Of course we haven't time ourselves,
To care for anyone,
Yet we hope that other folks
Will see that it is done.
We want the grief and penury
Of earth to be relieved;
We'd have the battles grandly fought,
The victories achieved;
We do not care to take the lead,
And stand the brush and brunt,
At lifting we're a failure,
But we're splendid on the grunt.

And there are others, so we find,
As on our way we jog,
Who want to do the lifting
On the small end of the log;
They do a lot of blowing, and
They strive to make it known
That were there no one else to help,
They'd lift it all alone.
If talking were effective,
There are scores and scores of men
Who'd move a mountain off its base
And move it back again.
But as a class, to state it plain,
In language true and blunt,
They're never worth a cent to lift,
For all they do is grunt.

Marriage in France.

BY R. B. KERR.

One of the striking facts of modern civilization is that it has done so little to lessen the fundamental difference of institutions, customs, and ideas, which divides the Latin from the Teutonic races. To a German, Englishman, or American, the French are merely a lot of very wicked and frivolous sensualists, whom God is gradually extinguishing as a punishment for their sins. The Frenchman, on the other hand, considers himself as much superior to all foreigners as an ancient Greek, and regards the aforesaid critics as a lot of clownish Yahoos. The foreign press waxes hysterical over the fact that an Alsatian Jew with a German name was unjustly imprisoned by the French for five years. The French are too ignorant of everything out of France to retort in kind by asking what about the niggers who are burnt at the stake without trial; but they reply by the more sunny way of laughing convulsively at everything that is not French. They can keep grave enough while the dollars are being handed over the counter, but the moment your back is turned they go into fits.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of Latin civilization to outsiders is the "marriage de convenance," which takes the place of our marriage for love. To the Teutonic mind it seems all-important that life partners should choose each other voluntarily and that love should be the determining factor. To the French mind this is all moonshine. Marriage is a thing to be settled by the families of the contracting parties, and by no means by the parties themselves. The great business of a French mother is to scheme and negotiate for the marriage of her daughter, while she also spends a good deal of her time searching for a suitable wife for her son. The law maintains the rights of parents in such matters, for no man under twenty-five or woman under twenty-one can marry without the consent of the parents.

To marry for money is still considered rather a stigma in America or England, but in France it is almost a disgrace not to marry for money. A girl without a dowry has a very poor chance in France, even if she is pretty. From the time of her birth her parents begin to save for her dowry, and her matrimonial value is determined chiefly by the amount they can manage to scrape together. If the girl belongs to the poorer classes, she sets to work herself, and toils early and late to earn the purchase price of a husband. Many a woman, however, can get married simply on a reputation for hard work, because the husband figures that she will be able to earn plenty of money after the marriage, although she has little or none before.

Having got together as big a dowry as possible, the next business of the French mother is to get good value for her money. A careful study is made of all the eligible males in the market, and not merely the income but the character of a possible husband is often considered, for French parents are very anxious for the happiness of their children. At last a promis ng husband is spotted, and the various parents meet together to arrange the deal. There is much haggling and bidding by both sexes, for the French women are better traders than the men. But finally the bargain comes to an end, the notary is sent for, a long and elaborate contract is drawn up, and the goods are delivered.

But a dowry is not the only important possession of a French girl. It is all-important that she be delivered perfectly immaculate to her spouse. If there was the shadow of a doubt about this, her exchange value would be greatly reduced; in fact, it is doubtful if she would fetch a larger percentage of her proper value than the damaged goods in a store. Consequently she is most strictly looked after up to the date of her marriage. The great ambition of a French mother is to be able to say that her daughter has never in her life been alone with a man outside of the family, and to make sure of this the girl is accompanied wherever she goes. The German and Anglo-Saxons assume that a woman is naturally chaste and can guard her own virtue, but the French take no stock in anything of that kind.

When a Frenchwoman is married her freedom begins; and many French women make great use of it. Husbands and wivss are at least as jealous in France as elsewhere, but Mrs. Grundy is not so watchful. She considers it the business of each to watch his own property, and if she sees anything going on she smiles and says nothing. Indeed, the French are always rather on the side of the devil. The only trouble is that confession has to be made to the priest, but the French God is very good about settling anything for cash, and thrift is so universal among the French that the needful amount is pretty sure to be forthcoming.

Reports about the French old maids vary, but I think it is pretty certain that the good nature of Mrs. Grundy in that country is entirely in their favor. After they have lost their marketable value, their mothers do not seem to trouble much about them; and the general view probably is that they are in hard luck, and fully entitled to anything they can get. I think there is little doubt that most French husbands and wives love each other very much. They are partners in business, or else the wife keeps a little store, and the husband goes out and works. In any case both do their best to add to the family income, as it is very necessary to be saving for the children early and late. Except when some love affair is going on, they hate to be separated; and the French are even more shocked than the English and Germans at American women who go over to enjoy themselves in Europe, while their husbands are working hard at home. Amorousness, love of children, domestic comfort and economy, are the key-notes of the French character. They must have good eating and drinking, although not too much of either; and of course a Frenchwoman must be well dressed; but they have a horror of waste, and care little for ostentation.

A French woman would consider it very dishonorable to flirt. She thinks that if she once encourages a man, she must take all the logical consequences. French women are among the most sensible in the world. When they bicycle, they never dream of wearing anything but knickerbockers; and when they walk in the rain, they would rather show any amount of ankle than take chances of soiling their dress. In this last particular, they are exactly like the English.

In the matter of divorce the French have switched about a good deal. They established it, then abolished it, and again in 1884 they re-established it At present their law is rather liberal, for they give divorce for excess, cruelty, serious assault, conviction of crime, and adultery.

Some years ago the French government maintained foundling hospitals, with convenient receptacles into which anyone could go and leave a baby, and then go away without being seen. For some reason, however, this institution has been discontinued, but there is considerable agitation to re-establish it

By far the most remarkable fact about France is that it is the only civilized country in which the population is actually decreasing. The decrease would be more serious were it not for the influx of foreign immigrants, but the French do not like the prospect of their own race being gradually wiped out. It is generally admitted that this decline is due to two economic causes, the dowry system and the Code Napoleon. As the value of a girl depends on her dowry, the parents only wish to have one daughter, in order to make the very best of her. Moreover, the Code Napoleon provides for almost exactly equal divison of property among the children. If a man has five children, for example, the law divides his property into six parts, of which each child gets a part, while the father can do what he likes with the remaining sixth. Under this system the parents have to limit their families, to prevent their little farms being divided into such small pieces as to make them useless. Two is considered as the logical number for a peasant family, for then each will get half the parents' land by inheritance, and half of someone else's land by marriage.

The landless classes are more prolific, and bring the birth-rate up to an average of a little over three to a marriage; but this is too low to keep the population even. The French console themselves a little by the reflection that all civilized peoples are rapidly declining in fecundity, and France is only fifty years ahead of the rest in infertility, because equally ahead in civilization. But they are much concerned about it all the same, and are seriously considering a remedy. Opinions differ a good deal, but it is safe to say that the reform finally chosen will be state subsidization of maternity, and thus we shall see the inauguration of a wise and equitable institution, which will sooner or later be adopted in all countries.

REMARKS.

I am probably one of those to whom the editor alludes when he says "many of our readers seem not to believe in rights o any sort." This is rather a misrepresentation, as we merely disbelieve in divine and natural rights. Comte said, with considerable truth, that the human mind tended to pass through three stages, the theological, the metaphysical, and the positive. In the theological stage men believed that rights and duties were ordained by God. Then came the metaphysical stage, in which it was believed that some abstraction called Nature had mysteriously implanted ideas of right, duty, justice, truth, etc., etc., in the mind of man. The Declaration of Independence, Mr. Bryan, Henry George, and some of Lucifer's writers, are excellent examples of this stage of thought. Last came the positive school, who realize that nature is quite non-ethical, and found ethics merely upon practical utility. Historically ethics were developed because they turned out to be useful in the struggle for existence, for maternal and paternal love helped to preserve offspring, while social and patriotic ties were invaluable in helping to defeat and exterminate disunited peoples. Ethics are extremely useful within certain limits, and ought to be maintained and inculcated in the young. The words "right" and "duty" are short, expressive, and useful, but when we come to philosophise, we must not forget their origin.

Students of Herbert Spencer are apt to give unequal weight to the different parts of his definition of evolution. Mr. Brinkerhoff does not forget that evolution is a change from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, known as differentiation; but he does forget that it is also a change from separation to unity, known as integration, which Spencer calls "the primary process in evolution." The supreme test of high organization is that the members should be as individual and varied as possible, and yet at the same time have their activities strictly subordinated to the organic welfare of the whole. To this end a regulative organization is necessary, and has actually been developed in the higher animal and social organisms by the stress of natural selection. See Spencer's essays on "Specialized Administration" and the "Social Organism"; also Huxley on "Administrative Nihilism"; all obtainable at very low prices in the Humboldt Library.

Ante-Nuptial Contracts.

BY S. R. SHEPHERD.

Twenty-five years ago I became acquainted with a Massachussetts lady through "Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly." We agreed to form a marriage co-partnership, dissolvable at the option of either, and each to take out what they put in, without interest, the gain to be divided equally.

She expected to get something from the estate of her deceased husband but failed. I sent her money to come west and we drew up an ante-nuptial common law contract and were married, the officiating justice attesting that it was read and fully explained to both parties who each acknowledged a thorough understanding of it.

Among other things it contained the mutual acknowledgment that each was induced by and in consideration of the concessions, representations and promises of the other to enter into the marriage relation. Each irrevocably appointed or named an attorney to appear in court and waive statutory rights in conflict with the contract, "hereby ratifying his acts," and instructing judge and jury to hold both to the contract should either be led by evil counsel to dishonorably seek evasion, each pledging their most sacred word of honor to stand true and faithful to their plighted vows, calling upon all human kind to point the finger of shame at the one which proved recreant and treacherous and to stamp upon their forehead the brand of blackest infamy.

Fourteen years later she desired to live in California and I in Kansas. She selected an attorney to assist her in determining the amount due her under the contract. After figuring a week she named the sum and asked if I thought it was right. I said it was too little—I would make it per cent more. We quareled a while, when she accepted the greater sum; a divorce was obtained and we kissed each other good by.

If fair and just in its provisions, a contract of that kind will deter any one but a fool or devil from going into court, to be looked upon as the personification of all that is false, perfidious and vile. All the world despises a treacherous sneak. No decent attorney would take such a case. Any one who goes into court reeking with fraud and dishonor and asks it to help them consummate an act of infamy stands prejudiced and condemned.

Courts do not relish the idea of being used for such base and ignoble ends, and the chances are that the case would go against them in whole or in part. In some states the courts are quite liberal in the enforcement of common law principles and equities and the lower courts in most of the states are much inclined in that direction.

All liberal, thinking people should have ante-nuptial contracts, embodying their views and agreements, first to educate toward secular marriage and right of contract, and second for the deterrent and moral and judicial advantages to be gained.

South-Eastern Missouri.

BY C. J. ZEITINGER.

The question how to get a cheap farm, well located, capable of producing a variety of fruits and other products, in a healthy and agreeable climate and where the products of labor will bring good prices—these questions present themselves daily to thousands of people living in cities and also in rural districts of the Northern and also Western parts of the United States.

In deciding upon a place for a home the settler must look out for the following principal points.

First. Climate—medium heat in summer and not excessively cold in winter.

Second, Topography of the country—elevation, drainage, etc.

Third. Character of the soil—natural productions, timber etc.

Fourth. Location as to markets, both home and distant including facilities for reaching these markets.

Fifth. Quality and supply of water for drinking purposes and all other uses.

Sixth. Cost of building material and fuel.

Seventh. Adaptability to fruit growing, live stock raising, and poultry farming.

Eighth. Church and educational advantages.

Ninth. State of public finances—rate of taxation.

The writer of these lines has been a resident of South-East Missouri for more than fifteen years, and in answering the above questions can speak from personal experience and observation, and particularly about that part of South-East Missouri lying in the foot hills of the Ozarks, which seems to have been overlooked or neglected by fruit growers generally and which is truly the home of the peach.

If you wish to know something about a country which is as yet only partially developed, but at the same time has been proved equal to any portion of the globe in fruit growing, follow this article.

If you are interested in a section of country which has the advantage of mild winters and summers rendered delightful on account of constant breezes from off the western prairie, read what follows:

First—(a) Climate. The climate is healthful; malarial fevers and chills being almost unknown. The summer heat very seldom exceeds ninety degrees, and even then the nights are cool, here sunstrokes and native consumption are unknown. The temperature in the winter, except for short intervals during the morning hours and occasionally for two or three days, never goes below the freezing point. One of the advantages of the climate is that it seems to have a beneficial effect on the health of those troubled with bronchial catarrhal diseases. In fact it is the land without extremes of heat and cold.

(b) Rainfall. There is rarely ever a month in the year that sufficient rain to raise a crop does not fall. A complete failure of crops is unknown. The total average rainfall for a year is about forty-five to fifty-two inches, distributed over the whole year.

Second. Topography. The cultivatable lands are gently rolling; valleys with natural drainage in the shape of creeks and larger streams. The elevation is about 850 to 1000 feet above sea level, with many beautiful crowns which rise even higher than 1300 feet above sea level—a splendid altitude for peach growing. Roads are good generally speaking and without excessive grades. In fact much of the upland or plateau lands are only slightly rolling, just sufficiently undulating to drain well.

Third. Soil. The soil is in most instances a light clay loam; top soil containing more or less mixtures of decayed vegetable matter and in some instances partaking of the nature of sandy loam while in other sections it is mixed with gravel and a sprinkling of surface rock from the size of an egg to a cubic foot. The under soil is in some sections a heavy yellow clay while on the other sections the subsoil is a heavy deep red clay, denoting very strong land and rich in mineral elements.

I am only an amateur orchardist but my experience tells me that this soil is especially adapted to fruit growing in general, while on the valleys and flats, wheat, oats and corn are fairly good crops; also timothy and other grasses grow well. All the higher crowns are admirably suited for peach, apple, pears, plums, apricots and cherries, while the small fruits, strawberries, raspberries and blackberries can be grown to perfection on the richer slopes and flats.

The Native Timber. We find here the black walnut sugar tree, hackberry, hickory, white ash, red oak, post oaks, elm, yellow pine and other woods.

Fourth. Location and shipping facilities. Zeitonia Heights, the home of the peach, is located on the main line of the St Louis I. M. & S. R. R., at Gad's Hill Station. It is central, being only 120 miles from St Louis, from whence inland markets on all points of the compass are within easy reach being about 400 miles nearer the center of population than South Missouri.

[The last page of Mr. Zeitinger's manuscript was misplaced. Feeling a deep interest in the question of the best places in which to practicalize the ideals set forth in "Hilda's Home," and "Cityless and Countryless World," we have given considerable space to a description of South East Missouri. For further particulars Mr. Zeitinger can be addressed at Zeitonia, Mo.

Premiums for Our Workers.

Some time ago a book valued at two dollars was offered for the largest club of trial subscribers to the Light-Bearer Library. That premium has not yet been awarded. Inasmuch as summer is the worst time in all the year to get subscribers, the time of competing for said premium has been extended to January first. The book offered is an expensively gotten up work of over three hundred pages, entitled, "Hidden Secrets Revealed, or the Curtain Lifted," by George N. McLean, with Introduction by Wm. Lloyd Garrison. It is physiological, ethical, and hygienic, and while written from a conservative standpoint, contains much that is of great value to every reader, especially the young. This book was donated to Lucifer's work by a medical friend.

This finely bound book is offered to the worker who will send us the largest number of trial subscribers to the monthly Library, at ten cents for three months, either back numbers or future issues.

We also now offer a volume of Lucifer, 52 numbers, substantially bound in black cloth, price postpaid, $1.75, for the largest list of yearly subscribers to the Light-Bearer Library, twelve numbers, at 50 cents a year. Premiums to be awarded Jan. 1.

We also offer a bound volume of Lucifer to the getter up of the largest club of trial subscribers to the weekly at twenty-five cents for three months. Awards to be made Jan. 1.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint: A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution, its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

Light Bearer Library, No. 8,

Contains "The Coming Woman," by Lillie D. White. This very excellent essay was read before the International Liberal Congress of '93. It was published in pamphlet form at Topeka, Kansas, and has been for some time out of print. By press of other business and by the continued absence of Mrs. White herself, who has been employed in our office for some two years past, and who was called to Louisiana to attend her sick son, the September Library has been delayed. It is now nearly ready for the pressman, and if all goes well, will be sent to subscribers next week.

Tolstoi.*

I have been reading a little book with this title. It is in two parts, the first written by Alice B. Stockham M. D., of this city, in which an account is given of her trip to Russia, mainly it would seem, to interview the most noted advocate of peace and brotherhood that this century has produced. The second part, entitled "The New Spirit," is written by H. Havelock Ellis, author of the well known book "Psychology of Sex."

The story of "Tolstoi" as told by these two writers is one of absording interest to all who are now looking for a way out of the wilderness of commercialism and monopolistic greed. The following paragraphs from the observations of Dr. Stockham, at the time of her visit to the home of Tolstoi, show what appears to be the animus and philosophy of the Russian sage:

"His trust in Omnipotence is not only a bulwark for himself but creates an atmosphere about his home, his kindred and all within his radius; they are defended; theft, murder, rapine, is impossible. His house requires no locks; his possessions no bolts or bars, for his fortress and bulwarks are built of more stable material, a mightier power of defense than any man-made weapons of warfare. Tolstoi would say to Christians: prove your Christianity by your faith in man. Unbar your doors; not only beat your swords into plows and your spears into pruning hooks, but turn the locksmith's genius into the production of tokens of love and fidelity.

"Does love rule in one's own small world? Then it becomes a central sun whose light and effulgence are free to all. Servants are trusted to pantry stores, dainty dishes are not hidden from children, while jewels and money are within easy reach of friends and neighbors. In the office, the cash drawer is guarded by no elaborate mechanism, the combination is never turned on the safe, which is used only as a precaution against fire.

"Can one doubt that service is given with an added zest and dignity in such love-laden environment and that it soon becomes a matter of course that the key grows rusty in the lock and the office of policeman a sinecure?"

One of Tolstoi's exemplars and teachers was a Russian peasant named Soutaieff. On page 104 of the book is this story:

"One evening a beggar woman had knocked at Soutaieff's door, asking shelter for the night. She was given food and a place to rest. Next morning all the family went to work in the field. The woman took the opportunity of collecting all the valuables she could lay her hands on, and fled. Some peasants at work saw her, stopped her, examined her bundle, and having bound her hands, led her before the local authorities. Soutaieff heard of this, and soon arrived. 'Why have you arrested her?' 'She is a thief; she must be punished,' they cried. 'Judge her not, and you will not be judged,' he said solemnly; 'we are all guilty at some point. What is the good of condemning her? she will be put in prison, and what advantage will that be? It would be much better to give her something to eat, and let her go in the grace of God.'"

Continuing the narrator says:

"The influence of Soutaieff appears in 'What then must we do?'—a further chapter in the history of Tolstoi's development, and perhaps the most memorable of his attempts at the solution of social questions. . . . It was the question that pressed itself for solution on Tolstoi when he began to investigate the misery of Moscow, and to start philanthropic plans for its amelioration. He tells us in this narrative, which has a dramatic vividness of its own that will not bear abbreviation, how he was gradually forced, by his own well meaning attempts and mistakes, to abandon his philanthropic projects, and to realize that he himself and all other respectable and well-to-do people were the direct causes of the misery of poverty.

"He investigated the worst parts of the city, finding more comfort and happiness amidst rags than he had expected, and only discovering one hopelessly useless class—the class of those who had seen better days, who had been brought up in the notions that he himself had been brought up in as to the relative position of those who are workers and those who are not workers.

"He met with a prostitute who stayed at home nursing the child of a dying woman. He asked her if she would not like to change her life—to become, he suggested at random, a cook. She laughed: 'A cook? I cannot even bake bread;' but he detected in her face an expression of contempt for the occupation of a cook.

"This woman, who, like the widow of the Gospel, had in the simplest way sacrificed all that she possessed for a dying person, thought, like her companions, that work was low and contemptible. Therein was her misfortune. But who of us, man or woman, can save her from this false view of life? Where among us are the people who are convinced that a life of labor is more honorable than one of idleness, who live according to such a conviction, and value and respect men accordingly?'"

In these paragraphs, as some of us see it, Tolstoi and his narrator have touched upon one of the most formidable of all the obstacles in the way of the humanitarian reformer, viz: the low estimate that is placed upon labor as such, and upon all who perform the most common and most necessary work in the great human hive. Tolstoi abandoned his work in the slums of the great city because he saw the uselessness of trying to get women to forsake a life of prostitution and seek employment at some useful labor so long as the women most respected in society live lives of idleness, and bring up their daughters without work, instructing them only in the art of catching a husband; that is, the art of selling their persons to the highest bidder in the matrimonial market.

The same reasoning showed him the futility of trying to convince the boys in the slums that labor was more honorable than trying to live by one's wits. When he took a friendless boy "into his home among the servants, pending some better arrangement," the boy soon ran away and joined a circus. The little human waif saw that Tolstoi's sons did not work—that they spent their time in idleness and sport. "I ought to have understood," adds Tolstoi, "how foolish on my part—I who brought up my children in luxury to do nothing—to try to improve other people and their children, who lived in what I call 'dens,' but three-fourths of whom worked for themselves and for others."

In politics Tolstoi "is as uncompromising as Ibsen in dealing with the state. It is a humbug, this state," said Tolstoi to W. T. Stead. "What you call a government is merely phantasmagoria. What is a state? Men I know; peasants and villages, these I see; but governments, nations, states, what are these but fine names invented to conceal the plundering of honest men by dishonest officials."

"Law, tribunals, prisons," adds the narrator, "become impossible with the disappearance of the state; and with the disappearance of the country, and of 'that gross imposture called patriotism,' there can be no more war."

This seems very similar to the saying of Thomas Paine, "The world is my country, to do good my religion." It is narrow sectionalism that gives rise to patriotism—"patriotism, that last resort of knaves," as some one has expressed it.

Next week we propose to give our readers the great Russian humanitarian's idea of what should take the place of the state; with its laws, its tribunals and its prisons. M. H.

Fall and Winter Campaign.

Of far greater importance—as some of us see it—than is the present political campaign to decide which of two political factions (as near alike almost as were the Siamese twins) shall have the privilege of robbing the people in the name of the law and order for the next four years—vastly more important to human weal than this costly political war of the ballots, is Lucifer's campaign of education, the object of which is to arouse the slumbering women and men of our land to see the necessity of creating a better race of human beings as the only sure way of securing better institutions, better and more equitable laws, and better administration of those laws.

The saying that the institutions of any country or nation are as good and as bad as the people who make or who passively submit to these institutions, cannot be too often repeated.

It is doubtless true that both action and reaction are at work here. Bad men—narrowly selfish men—make bad laws, and in turn bad laws are made the excuse or occasion for exerting a tremendous influence in making bad people.

But in the order of nature men precede laws. Laws are wholly inoperative and dead without living agents to administer them. Human laws—and I for one recognize the existence of no other laws—are not self-acting, not automatic, as are the forces of nature (incorrectly called laws.)

The logical inference then is that men are superior to their institutions, men are above their laws. The creator, man, is greater than the creature, law.

If so, then the rational, the logical method of getting better laws is first to make better creators of laws.

The natural and only sure way to make better men—men embrace women!—is through the natural process called generation. The "supernatural" process called re-generation has long been tried, only to prove its utter futility, its worse than failure.

The most noteworthy effect of regeneration, so-called, is to make people more submissive to invasion; more criminally submissive to government of man by his fellow man, and especially government of woman by man, thereby depriving woman of self-ownership and through the sex-enslavement of woman depriving her children of the right to be born well; the result being an overproduction of the weak and criminally inclined masses.

Lucifer's campaign of education is not confined to a single specialty, but inasmuch as this the most important of all line is almost wholly neglected by nearly all other reform journals, lecturers and writers, Lucifer and its corps of workers are concentrating their forces mainly upon this the most neglected and most needed of all humanitarian reforms.

Lucifer's campaign is heralded by no flourish of trumpets, no torch-light processions, no beating of drums and tambourines in the streets. It has no campaign songs, catch-words or slogans; no paid speakers—for the reason that it has no campaign fund. Its only means of support is derived from the sale of its literature, including books, pamphlets, and the weekly and monthly issues of Lucifer and the Light Bearer Library, and therefore its success must depend on the co-operative help it receives from those who recognize the need and the importance of such campaign of education.

Religion Unrevised.

Most preachers of the present day have discretion enough to say little or nothing about the cruder and more barbaric features of their creeds, but occassionally we find one whose preaching reminds us of the gospel sermons thundered from the pulpit in our boyhood days, fifty or sixty years ago, at camp-meetings, and at the annual winter "revival" occasions. Among these reminders of a past and gone generation is the individual known as "Sam." Jones. The following clipped from an exchange appears to be a fair specimen of a style of pulpit oratory which is so seldom heard in these days that many go to hear the speaker out of curiosity, much as they would go to see a skeleton of an extinct race of mammals, or of the saurian age of reptilian development.

"Here is a man who has never been five hundred miles from Galesburg and he says there is no God and he has never read five hundred pages of solid literature and he says there is no hell but he will not be in hell one second until he will cringe and say: 'My God! what a mistake I made.' Today the Methodist and Baptist churches are the greatest exponents of God, and in the last four years they have lost numerically. You old sisters, you are all right, but you have no sense. Don't worry, for if you should get into water over your head, you would float for your head wouldn't sink. Come here once a year and get something in your noggen. You old dogs can't expect to learn much, but come and bring the pups, they will learn. Methodists and Presbyterians are about the same thing, for the Methodist thinks he has religion, but is afraid he will lose it, and the Presbyterian is safe, but he doesn't know he has it. You old hypocritical devils pray to God to save your boys and our land from rum and then go down and vote the Republican or Democratic ticket with the lousy devils who want rum licensed. Well, if you don't go to hell, it will be because hell has been burned out before you get there."

Five Years for Three Dollars.

Lucifer's plan of campaign depends for success largely upon prompt renewals. Some of our friends have accepted the offer of five years subscription for three dollars, or five yearly subscriptions sent to different addresses for three dollars. While millions are being spent in worse than useless military campaigns in the Philippines and in China, and other millions in the worse than useless political campaigns, is it too much to ask for a few paltry hundreds to be spent in Lucifer's campaign of education and agitation for higher and better ideals in regard to the creation of a better race of human beings?

There never was a book so sacred that it could sanctify a lie. All truth is holy, whether it be written in books, or stones, or stars; and all error is unholy, no matter in what scriptures it may be. Morals that cannot be defended ought to be condemned. It is not within the power of the sanhedrim, or the synod, or the ecumenical council, to convert bad morals into good religion.—M. M. Trumbull.

Hilda's Home.

First the ideal then the real, the actual, the visible, the tangible; first the windwork and then the groundwork is nature's plan of campaign. We still have a fairly good supply of the paper covered edition of this truly noble and inspiring ideal of what is now practicable in home building, as a necessary step towards the building of a race of human beings that will abolish wars, strikes, poverty, crime and misery. Printed on superior paper, with large new type; 426 pages; price only fifty cents, or four dollars per dozen when bought for distribution as a missionary or campaign document.

Cityless and Countryless World.

Is the name of another high and noble ideal of the New Time—the time that is to come with the realization of the newer and truer ideals of what life on Earth could be made to mean. Paper cover fifty cents; finely bound in red cloth one dollar.

VARIOUS VOICES.

W. B., New York:—I enclose money order for six dollars. Five towards getting your book out. I wish I had it now, as I have time to read some, but may not later. The other dollar is to renew my subscription for another year.

M. E. Morse, San Francisco:—I am in arrears for subscription to Lucifer. I don't know just how much. I also subscribed for your autobiography; so will forward you two dollars, one or the book and one to apply on subscription to Lucifer. I have just passed my eighty-second birth day. Am able to do a pretty good day's work; and may live to vote for Debs and Harriman this fall. I hope so.

Shepard B. Cowles, Trufant, Mich.:—In "Our Purpose" you truly say the institutions, laws and customs of any people are on a plane with the people who make them, &c. I add, any people are on a plane with their environment. And there can not be a moral plane without a moral environment. The Socialist Republic is not a reform; it is not state socialism; it is a moral revolution, a moral environment under which freedom in love and sex is possible because on a moral plane.

Frank D. Blue, Terre Haute, Ind.:—In reply to Mr. H. C. Draper's question in No. 832 of Lucifer, I wish to say, I believe all statutes will allow such adoption. Generally the laws of adoption read about as follows: "Any person may adopt any child," etc., the question of marriage being waived. This will not make them "legitimate," by law, but places them in the line of inheritance the same as "wedlock" children.

J. Steiner, Washington, D. C.:—Your rebuke to Cardinal Gibbons is well merited but not half severe enough. Having been brought up a Catholic myself, I know the animal, and can assure you that what he has to say against the unscrupulous rich is intended to be taken only in a pickwickian sense; intended to placate the (m)asses and impress them with the idea that the feigned sympathy that he expresses is real, when he knew that he and his church stand cheek by jowl with that very gang, and ever ready to share the spoils of labor's exploitation. He is not worth wasting either breath or ink upon.

E. T. Daniels, Alva, Okla.:—Allow me to say to our many friends among Lucifer's readers that the dear loving companion who for near thirty years was the joy and comfort of my life, has left us. She died on the seventh of this month, at the age of fifty-six years. She died as she had lived for more than twenty-five years, a fearless and concientious agnostic. Our home here will be broken up. I think of going to see the new country in South Oklahomo, that is to be opened up next spring. O how I would like to have a group of good liberals to take claims around me. If you know any who are looking for homes I wish you would put me in communication with them.

James F. Morton, Jr., San Francisco, Calif.—Replying to Voltairine de Cleyre's request for the expression of opinions, I must express my surprise that any such statement is considered necessary. An Anarchist jury is as inconceivable as an Anarchist judge, president, legislature, or prison. The semi-free lovers who marry, and the semi-Anarchists who vote, may find it consistent with their views to espouse these various forms of coercion, but the record of the historical Anarchist movement is that of unbroken opposition to every one of them. A man who is "voluntarily" arrested may abdicate his individuality sufficiently to place his future liberty in the keeping of a "free" jury; but this is quite aside from Anarchism.

Santiago Walker, Monterey, Mex.:—In answer to L. M.—New York. It is nothing in England or America for a person to assume a name not originally his or hers. In France it is a criminal offence, but they may take their mother's name. The fact of having changed one's name is a suspicious circumstance if one happens to be charged with any crime; for, coupled with change of residence, it looks like hiding. A marriage which is otherwise legal, is not illegal merely because either or both the parties to the marriage give assumed names or even totally false names. The name is simply to identify the person; but if the marriage takes place and this person can be identified in spite of an alias name, it is like any other case of alias and in legal proceedings of any importance afterward both the real and supposed name would be set forth. A bigamist often goes under different names. If convicted he is convicted as that man, called by whatever name but identified by the senses of witnesses. So of an heir; so of a person who has entered into any personal contract.

Mrs. J. N. L., Elmira, N. Y.:—My subscription to Lucifer expired with No. 829. Very sorry that I have been obliged to let these weeks slip by without renewing, but it seemed unavoidable. I now enclose one dollar to pay for the coming year. Wish I could send for some books, too, but it is impossible now; but hope to do so some time in the not far distant future. Lucifer is very helpful to me. The Light Bearer-Library I also enjoy very much, and when there is an article from you, [Lillian] I read it with the same feelings of delight with which I read a personal message from a dear friend. I am looking forward eagerly to the time when I will have your father's autobiography to read. A few weeks ago I read "Motherhood in Freedom," to a friend. She seemed dumbfounded; but next morning she said, "well there is a great deal of truth in what he says." So far I have only found one of my acquaintances who would read Lucifer, and her husband would not allow her to have it, and has misused her for having read it. So I'm not likely to help you to any new subscribers. But they must listen to a few words from me along this line once in a while. Not that I intrude my views upon others on every occasion. I do not, but when they open the way for me, then I always say what I believe to be the truth.

Harriet R., Concord, Okla.:—In "The Queen of the Air," by Ruskin, I found a paragraph that has a direct bearing upon the idea that the chief end and aim of woman's existence is the production of children. As it is always interesting to know what great minds think upon subjects in which we are interested, perhaps you would like to print the following:

"And where this life [plant life] is in it at full power, its form becomes invested with aspects that are chiefly delightful to our own human passions; namely, first, with the loveliest outlines of shape; and secondly, with the most brilliant phases of the primary colors, blue, yellow, and red or white, the unison of all; and to make it all the more strange, this time of peculiar and perfect glory is associated with relations of the plants or blossoms to each other, correspondent to the joy of love in human creatures, and having the same object in the continuation of the race. Only with respect to plants, as animals, we are wrong in speaking as if the object of this strong life were only the bequeathing of itself. The flower is the end or proper object of the seed, not the seed of the flower. The reason for seeds is that flowers may be; not the reason of flowers that seeds may be. The flower itself is the creature which the spirit makes; only, in connection with its perfectness is placed the giving birth to its success."

R. S. S., Ohio:—I do not feel able to do any propaganda work; do not even know what names to send you of persons who would probably be interested in the paper. I am getting to be pessimistic in my own mind in regard to the good that will come of such efforts, but this feeling I suppose must be laid to the account of my ill health. Sometimes I consider myself a "back number," not worthy to be counted as up to date with the present age. I know this is not the kind of message to do you good. If I cannot help I should not hinder, for I really think there is nothing in life so abhorrent as sex slavery—or the legal right of man over woman in this relation. I have always thought you were inspired, helped, sustained by the angel world, or by those over there who saw the great need of this agitation of thought, and who finding you so honest and true to your principles saw that you were well fitted to be a martyr in this unpopular cause. Thus thinking and believing I sincerely hope you may live many years to do and dare, and that you may see the good work prosper, and so I say, may God bless you and all good influences aid you in your chosen line of work. Enclosed find one dollar and sixty cents on subscription to Lucifer and for the "Unblind Cupid," thirty cents; "The Worm Turns," ten cents; "What is Religion"—Ingersoll—ten cents; "The Ballad of Reading Gaol," ten cents. You may also send the paper thirteen weeks—as per your premium offer—to the enclosed name.

[Thus it seems that our good and faithful friend believes that good wishes and prayers should be supplemented by good works. For a dozen years or more, though most of that time a great sufferer, the writer of this letter has faithfully and cheerfully helped to sustain Lucifer and its work, and for the reason that she does not feel able to work in any public capacity she asks us not to publish her name and address. The Light Bearer Library.

No. 1. The Evolution of the Family. By Jonathan Mayo Crane. "There is not a dry page or line in it. I wish some one would donate 100,000 copies of it for gratuitous distribution."—Elmina Drake Slenker. "It is a powerful engine of emancipation,"—Edwin C. Walker.

No. 2. Marriage and Morality. An address delivered before the Ohio Liberal Society by Lillian Harman. Boston "Ideas" says of this address: "Standing in the foremost ranks of radical thinkers and with the full courage of her convictions, Mrs. Harman has no hesitancy in setting forth in unequivocal terms her views on the matrimonial state and she incisively points out the fallacies of modern society and her plan for their correction."

No 3. Judgment. By William Platt, author of "Do we Live? Do we Love?" and other startling radical books. The great Grant Allen said: "Inspired madmen are rare; only thrice in a century does our planet produce a Blake, a Walt Whitman, a Maurice Maeterlinck. To this little company of elementary geniuses, Mr. William Platt, I take it, belongs of right—so much so that it seems incongruous courtesy to Mister him." Richard Le Gallienne says: "Never was such a bitter blasphemous pessimist as this William Platt, yet never a more tender, faithful believer in Love and Beauty."

No. 4. The Regeneration of Society. An address delivered by Lillian Harman before the Manhattan Liberal Club in New York City. "The best number yet issued".—Lois Waisbrooker.

No. 5. Love in Freedom. By Moses Harman. Also Social Evolution, by Moses Harman. The first essay is an attempt to show that the marrial institution is the chief source of social inequalities and tyrannies with their long catalogue of evils in the shape of crimes, vices, insanities, idocies, etc. The second essay is a brief study of Social Evolution as seen in the history of the human race with inferences drawn therefrom as to how the future progress and happiness of human kind can be promoted or practicalized.

No. 6. Motherhood in Freedom. By Moses Harman. "A powerful plea for the emancipation of woman, particularly in the exercise of her maternal function."—The Rev. Sidney Holmes.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed?

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

'The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. 1.00

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. 1.00

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 36 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy. .05

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. .10

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages .15

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Paper covers 50 cents. Cloth. 1 00

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. 1.00

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul, "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers .50

THE EDUCATION OF THE FEMININE WILL.

BY MLLE. HARLOR.

"To be able to reason and to have pride is superfluous for one who has only to obey. . . . Reason is the liberator of conscience"—p. 7.

"Not only is it necessary to claim economic emancipation; it is necessary to preach moral emancipation at the same time and with equal fervor. It must be said that the first without the second would be three-quarters barren, and that the decisive revolution is the inward revolution. . . . Resignation is the perpetual avowal of impotency."—pp. 9, 11.

A wonderfully clear and strong exposition of the demands of awakened womanhood—by a self-reliant, self-respecting woman.

Price three cents each; per dozen for distribution twenty five cents.

Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness who addresse humanity.—From the Preface.

The British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 507 Carroll Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound 50 cents; cloth, $1.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. IV., No. 49. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, DEC. 22, E. M. 300. [C. E. 1900.] WHOLE No. 844

The Ninety and Nine.

There are ninety and nine that work and die
In hunger and want and cold,
That one may live in luxury,
And be lapped in the silken fold.
And ninety and nine in their hovels bare,
And one in a palace of riches rare.

From the sweat of their brows the desert blooms,
And the forest before them falls.
Their labor has builded the humble homes.
And the cities with lofty halls:
And the one owns cities and houses and lands,
And the ninety and nine have empty hands.

But the night, so dreary and dark and long
At last shall the morning bring:
And over the land the victor's song
Of the ninety and nine shall ring:
And echo afar from zone to zone,
"Rejoice, for Labor shall have its own!"

My Ideal of Love in Freedom.

Lois Waisbrooker, in "Clothed with the Sun."

I speak only for myself on this question, knowing, as I do, that there are many who have the same high ideal. Others have come into our ranks with only the idea of selfish gratification. These claim our name, but they are not of us. When science takes hold and analyzes the vibratory law of love in freedom we shall then be understood and justified.

I shall never forget my emotions when I first learned that the character vibrations of the tones of the voice could be photographed. Of course there is a scientific method of doing this, for the conditions must be such as to catch and hold the vibrations. This is done by speaking into a tube over the opposite end of which is stretched a delicate, sensitive film especially prepared for the purpose.

It has been demonstrated in the experiments made in this line that tones of anger, envy, selfishness, etc., give the form of bugs, worms and other repulsive things, such as represent disgust or cruelty. But loving tones, tones that are the expression of kindness, benevolence and other desirable qualities, vibrate in the forms of flowers, and I once saw the likeness of a perfect rose taken in this way. I often wonder why the significance of this demonstrated fact is not more widely considered and then acted upon.

Let the selfish, hypocritical man or woman, the one who professes one thing and means another, be subjected to such a test and the real character will be revealed. But it is not so much in a personal as in a general sense that I wish to examine this far-reaching law.

Those who honestly and earnestly advocate social freedom are accused of immorality, of being selfish, animal in their purpose. I would like to see this matter tested. I would like to have a score or two of the earnest men and women who are agitating the question of what is called free love—I would like to see the vibratory tones of their voices as they talk upon this subject taken as above stated. Then I would have the same test applied to an equal number of men and women who advocate the perpetuation of the present legal marriage system. I would like to see which showed the most flowers and which the most worms and other disagreeable things. Then I would like a dozen or more of those who are living in love without legality, and an equal number of the legally married, taking them as they come, tested in the same way.

There would be no trouble as to the result as connected with the loving couples who have declared for freedom. The pictured tones of their voices would show not only flowers, but singing birds and other emblems that illustrate liberty. What the legally bound showed would be the test whether they loved or not. But at the very best, the idea of dutiful submission on the part of the wife and of marital rights on the part of the husband, no matter how kept in the background, would mar the love vibrations, would lessen their beauty, while the vibrations of those who do not love—well, they would make repulsive pictures indeed.

Let the woman who is waiting the approach of her lover speak into such a tube, and then let the woman who is dreading the approach of her husband do the same. The latter may hide her feelings from the public, and even from her husband, but she cannot hide it from the sensitized film at the end of the tube. Then again, I would like a specimen from the high toned public woman, and down through all grades of that class to the very lowest dregs, and from the men who visit each grade. Will not some scientist investigate in this line?

If they would investigate the chemistry of human sex life—would gather the pictured vibrations that come from all grades and conditions, from the sex-starveling to the sex-surfeited, it seems to me a lesson might be learned which would show the difference between natural and legal morality, between "thus saith the Lord" and "thus saith love," and greatly in the favor of the latter.

Sex is the basis of creation—of all creation. From the lowest form of life to the highest, all physical, mental, moral and spiritual life comes from the union of the two factors of sex on the plane of development shown by that which is created. Sex rules the emotional of life. Anger, hatred, envy, jealousy,—all the various emotions that go to make up human life, these as well as that of love, are the expressions of the creative power behind them. Now just think of the enslaved condition of the sex life, and of all the various emotions, the vibrations of which fill the atmosphere with the invisible but real forms of bugs, worms, toads, snakes, of every fearful and hateful thing, and can you wonder that we have just what we do have?

Now my ideal of freedom is to unchain love, to make woman so free that under no possible condition can she be pressed into an unwilling relation. I would trust nature's chemistry when free to act through the feminine, for I know that she would never call for that which was not needed in her work of building forms. I speak of the feminine because it is through that embodied factor of sex that nature builds, and by the law of attraction.

Now p'ease stop and think—think of the vibrations of the present unbalanced conditions of the human sex life as being all removed from the atmosphere—think of these imaged forms all perishing for the lack of that which gives them form—think of all this and you have a glimpse of my ideal when I talk and write of the freedom of love. But this is only the negative side, and but a part of that, for when the atmosphere no longer holds the forms of the disagreeable, the cruel, the animals which represent these characteristics will cease to exist on earth. Now look at the positive side of the ideal that inspires the efforts I make. Think of the vital life, the love-life vibrations filling the atmosphere with forms of love and beauty that radiate health and happiness.

Such is my ideal of what the full freedom of love will bring to the race. And not only human life, but to all grades of life below us, both animate and inanimate. Many a truth is uttered intuitionally, the speaker feeling sure that what is stated is rooted in the eternal law of being, and yet they are not able to give one logical or scientific reason for what they assert. I saw such a statement recently, one to which my whole soul responded, for it came within the scope of my ideal. I cannot give the exact language, but the substance of it was that when sex was understood and honored in use, not only would the race be free from disease, but that all things below would profit thereby—that because of the quality of the sex magnetism permeating the very air, and because of the character of what is called sex-waste, which would be thrown off for the appropriation of the lower order of life, not directly, but just as truly thus appropriated. The last phrase, sex-waste, is my addition, as the writer believes there is no need of such secretion except for offspring.

> "Greener things would greener grow, > Beauteous things more brightly glow."

I think, however, that it is better to try to understand nature than to ignore her methods. Those who have No 5 of "Clothed With the Sun" should read carefully the article headed "The Mistakes of the Ages," as they will there learn the use of the sex life that is now called waste.

You will see, friends, that my free love ideal involves a great deal—covers a great deal of ground. That it cannot be lived, under the present economic system is apparent, but the importance of the subject warrants all that a complete change will cost. Law must let go, not only of its enslaving grip upon woman, but also upon natural wealth and opportunity to use, thus giving all an assured means of subsistence.

Oh what a change freedom will bring! As I walk the streets of this great city and mark the bruised and broken specimens of what should be a grand Humanity, I can sense the soul-cry of which they themselves are not conscious—the cry of the inner self-hood which says: Oh for the freedom of the creative life that such as we may no more be born upon the earth plane; and even the animals seem to plead for a better birth for those who have charge of them.

But I will not enlarge further. The position I take is scientific. It will stand the test of investigation; and so long as the vibrations that go forth from the sex-centers manifest from any other emotion than that of love, the atmosphere will be filled with the forms of repulsive and cruel things. So long will the evils with which Humanity is cursed continue to prevail.

I, for one, am proud of being able to work for so grand an object as freedom in love. When this is accomplished, the forms of the beautiful,—all the life giving elements of health and happiness will so fill the atmosphere that sickness and sorrow will be unknown, and heaven realized upon earth.

To those who doubt the possibility of what I have stated, I would ask: What is it that goes from the lips of the speaker to the ears of the hearers? The vibrations of the atmosphere, you reply. Yes, but these vibrations must take the perfect form made by the word spoken, or the listener could not understand their meaning. If such vibrations have their form, invisible, but real, why should not the emotions, love, hate, anger, etc., give out a character form of vibrations?

Edwin C. Walker.

BY C. W. C.

It is a common saying that no man is a prophet in his own country and that people generally stone and crucify their benefactors and saviors. This is certainly to a great extent true; but those who assembled at Dr. Gertrude Mack's residence on Sunday evening, December 9, can testify that we still have in the world men and women who are only too glad to give honor to whom honor is due.

Having learned that the 9th of December was the fifty-first birthday anniversary of Mr. Edwin C. Walker, a number of friends and admirers of this distinguished worker for the cause of freedom had decided to give him a "surprise party." The idea, I believe, originated in the mind of Dr. Mack, a lady of great intellectual and physical beauty and a true friend of Mr. Walker. The affair was kept a secret, and Mr. Walker did not know anything about it until he was "taken by surprise." How to entice Mr. Walker and punish him for the sin of having lived fifty-one years in this world was a difficult question, but finally it was decided that Dr. Mack should invite him to accompany her in the afternoon to the Brooklyn Philosophical Association, and thence go and take dinner with her at her residence. An innocent scheme, indeed!

At 6:30 p. m., the hour appointed for their arrival, the friends of Mr. Walker were in full force at Dr. Mack's parlor, but the hero of the evening and his fair "captor" were somewhat slow in making their appearance, and some of the guests began to feel a little uneasy. "Is it possible," they wondered, "that Dr. Mack was unsuccessful in her attempt to catch and cage the wild animal?" "They may not come at all," remarked Mr. Edward W. Chamberlain. "Shall we play 'Hamlet' with the Hamlet left out?" asked Dr. Charles L. Andrews.

But everything comes to him who waits. Finally they came, and before they had time to enter the parlor, the light was turned out, and Mr. Walker was greeted with shouts of "Edwin Cox W-a-l-k-e-r, Walker! Who is he? Who is he? One of the fathers of liberty," Mrs. M. Florence Johnson acting as the leader and master of ceremonies. Mr. Walker did not expect anything of the kind and did not know what to say. But it did not take him long to understand the situation, and shortly after the "fun" commenced in earnest.

It was a gathering of congenial people, and everybody was anxious to do all he or she could to make Mr. Walker happy. Dinner was announced and all started for the dining-room. To make the dinner as enjoyable as possible the heads of the guests were decorated with gaily colored paper caps. To see the philosophers of the Manhattan Liberal Club (for all of them were Liberal Club people) sitting around the table with the caps on their heads was a sight to make the gods laugh, as they undoubtedly did if they had any sense of humor. Radicals know a good thing when they see it, and they treated the dinner with justice and impartiality; in fact, they ate so much that the "birthday cake," prepared I believe by Mrs. Johnson, was not touched at all. Candy, with various mottoes, was passed round, and afforded great mirth to the party.

It was Cyrus W. Coolridge's fortune to read as his motto, "Where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise." He was pleased with it, and acted accordingly. When the dinner was over, Dr. Mack brought in a bag containing small packages, and told each guest to take one. The packages proved to be children's toys, and were a source of great amusement to the philosophers.

Next on the program was a bit of "refined cruelty" inflicted by the hostess on poor Mr. Walker. The fact is, Dr. Mack compelled him to read a number of congratulatory letters; and although all the good things said about him contained nothing but the truth, Mr. Walker blushed like a "school-girl" while reading them. The letters were from George E. Macdonald, the brilliant writer of the "Observations" in the "Truth Seeker," Hugh O. Pentecost, Bertha Johnson, Mrs. Moody and several others. A letter was expected from Lillian Harman and her daughter Virna, but it did not reach New York in time to be read at the meeting. To further punish Mr. Walker his friends presented him with a substantial token of friendship, and called upon him to make a speech. Mr. Walker is a ready speaker, as we all know, but on this occasion he was so overcome by emotion that all he could say was, "I thank you friends, for your kindness." The party then returned to the parlor and spent the rest of the evening in pleasant chat.

Among the people present, besides those mentioned above, were Pearl Johnson, Garcia Leao, Marie Andrews, Minerva Andrews, Mrs. A. J. Schofield, William D. Denton, Ernest Winne, Anna Stirling, and William J. Terwilliger.

One word more and I am done, as the old-time preachers used to say. If a reporter may be allowed to express an opinion of his own, I wish to state that Mr. Walker was honored by his friends because he deserves honor. He is a thinker and writer of exceptional ability, but, above all, he is a genuine man. There are so many shams in the world, so many people who are poor apologies for men, that it is a delight to find a real man. Long live Edwin C. Walker!

Lecture Tour by James F. Morton, Jr.

FRIEND HARMAN: Please announce in Lucifer that I expect to take a lecture tour, in connection with the removal of Free Society to Chicago. I shall probably start sometime in January and would like to hear at once from any readers of Lucifer between Chicago and the Pacific Coast, who can arrange for meetings, or desire a personal visit. My subjects will be:

The Essence of Liberalism.
Religious Liberty and its Force.
What Liberty Means.
Social Ideals.
Why I am an Anarchist.
The Battle for Free Speech.
The Meaning of Sex Freedom.
The Basis of Brotherhood.
Trades Unionism.
The Rights of Labor.

Recitations and lectures on literary or philosophical questions, by special arrangement. Address James F. Morton, Jr. 236 Clinton Park, San Francisco, Calif.

Modern Reveries of a Bachelor.

BY GEO. SEABROOKE.

There's lots of forbidden fruit that's not worth eating.

How astonished people appear when a man by his acts proves that he is a MAN.

Why not be honest with yourself?

I wonder why it is that Christians do not try to make eating a crime.

Many people produce a state of atrophy of the brain by letting others do their thinking.

What's the use of anything, anyway?

Don't be any better than you have to be.

A sexless man is necessarily virtuous. I have never heard him claim happiness, yet they say, "to be virtuous is to be happy."

Facts vs. Fancy.

BY E. F. HYLAND.

"Where am I at?" was the first inquiry of my infant mind.

The first answer was found in the "Holy Bible," and this became more ambiguous, more indefinite and more contradictory every time I read it.

Then the commentators, the high officials, both theologic and political, only threw dust and ashes in my eyes, as if to say, "Stand still; take what is given you and ask no questions!"

Then I turned to Ancient History and found it dealing only with very recent times, calling them ancient.

Then I asked Geography, and the answer I got told only of the present, leaving it to the imagination to tell how it got there.

Next I asked Geology, and Geology gave me facts, making no pretensions to ancient or modern.

Then loomed up before my mind the vastness, the incomprehensibility of the periods of time that had elapsed before man appeared on the earth. But geology gave me a solid basis for mental work, for nothing can successfully contradict plain facts.

With these plain facts of geology for a basis the true God of nature appears to me to consist of

First, Space.

Second, coequal with Space is Ether, or Eternal Life.

Third, Gravitation.

These three constitute Nature's Godhead.

From these premises as a basis I conclude that life is everywhere. Every place is a center, or at an equal distance from the circumference.

In the roll of eternal changes all the planets of the solar system stood on one side of the sun and were then brought together with such force that the entire mass, by centripetal gravitation, took the form of gaseous smoke. Then centripetal gravitation got in its work, first getting the gaseous materials into rings, then rolling those rings into planets and their satellites.

Centripetal gravitation is the force that continually works to crowd the material into smaller space, or nearer to each center, while centrifugal gravitation works to hold the material away from the centers, or from the great center of the solar system.

Life can show itself only where two parties of the right material meet at the right temperature. Then aggregation commences. If on the earth the aggregation takes the form of land plants, land animals, insects or birds. If in or on water the aggregation takes the form of aquatic plants or animals. So numerous are the kinds or species that geologists say for every kind now living they have found the remains of three hundred species that are now extinct.

Aggregation and segregation are Nature's laws—laws that never can be changed or reversed. Thus while some species are becoming extinct others are being created. How long this process is to continue we do not know. We know that the space round the sun is so nearly filled with small planets that it seems impossible that all the planets could again be ranged on ou side of the sun and thus be again resolved into gaseous smoke therefore it is probable that the earth will roll on until all life becomes extinct and the materials of the water and air become solid.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.

Our good Brother Hyland doubtless speaks for himself alone when giving his views if the cosmos. The above article is given a place, first, because the author has earned the right to be heard in Lucifer's columns, by long and faithful co-operation; and second, because he has been denied the right to be heard in quarters where he had reason to expect more courteous treatment. Evidently our friend is a thinker, but whether his thought-mill has ground out a grist of value to himself and others is a question I do not undertake to answer. M. H.

Perhaps the most potent of conservative institutions are those built round religion. The superhuman authority claimed for the creed and the threats of divine vengeance on unbelievers, exert a deadening influence of an unparalleled character upon the mind of man. The conservatism which appertains to religion is as it were doubly weighted. To the inertia which is characteristic of all long established institutions, is added that which is due to the fear of the unknown; to the respect which is paid to the commands of a society of individuals, is added the reverence which the supposed Divine origin of those commands creates. —Orford Northcote in "Ruled by the Tomb."

Political.

Now that the year is ending—the last year of the current century, a few words in review of the past twelve months and of forecast of the coming year will not be out of place.

In a carefully written review of the political campaign for the year 1900, common calendar, William J. Bryan, the Democratic candidate for president of the United States has this to say:

Defeat does not make it necessary for us to abandon anything for which we have fought. Imperialism was declared to be the paramount issue of the late campaign. Must we now indorse imperialism because the Republicans have won? The trust question was a prominent issue in the campaign and we denounced private monopoly as indefensible and intolerable. Must we abandon our fight against the trust because the Republicans have won? It would be just as reasonable to insist that the Democratic party should accept the Republican position on the gold question. . . . . The great financiers who stand behind the gold standard also stand behind the trusts, a large army and an imperial policy. If they can coerce the people into supporting the gold standard, banks of issue and a perpetual debt, they can coerce them into submission to private monopoly, militarism, and colonialism. . . . . The Democratic party stands for the Declaration of Independence and will oppose any party which will violate the principles set forth in that sacred document; the Democratic party stands for the Jeffersonian doctrine of equal rights to all and special privileges to none, and it will oppose any policy which violates that doctrine. It will in 1904, as it did this year, appeal to all who believe in those principles.

In accord with these reflections and statement of issues Mr. Bryan announces that he has no intention of giving up the fight for the principles he has been advocating. "Whether I am ever a candidate for office again is immaterial," says Mr. B., "but I shall continue to speak and write as in the past."

Whether Mr. Bryan would or could have carried out the policies or principles advocated by him, had he been elected, is matter of grave conjecture, but that he was not fairly or honestly dealt with by many of his professed adherents is scarcely a matter of doubt or uncertainty. Among those who clearly foresaw the result of the election, and the causes that made that result inevitable, is the venerable editor of the Lancaster, Wisconsin, "Teller," Mr. Edward Pollock. In his issue of November 1, five days before the election, he published in his paper a forecast of the result, from which we quote a paragraph or two.

The two important states of New York and Illinois could have been carried by Bryan if their Democratic "bosses" were honest. As the outlook now is "The Teller" expects them to be carried by McKinley. Sometime ago "The Teller" intimated a suspicion that there was a secret understanding between Croker, the Tammany boss, and Platt, the Republican boss, as to the disposal of New York. . . . Had he [Mayor Harrison] worked with Altgeld harmoniously they could have carried the city of Chicago by 40,000. But the tricky bosses [Democratic] do not want Bryan elected. The Republican bosses, too, want the old Democratic party saved. What a glorious old party it was!—as now apotheosized in Republican campaign literature. Splendid old record! Never did anything bad in war times or any times, till Bryan came up.

As long as they can keep the two old regimes alive—the Republican and the Democratic—they can take turns, the one holding the commonwealth cow while the other milks her. They will never let a strong, able man, sincere in his devotion to the welfare of the Nation and its people, like Bryan, get into control of the government if they can prevent it. Croker has no bargain with Bryan about a cabinet position or control of New York appointments. His bargain is with Platt and Hanna, and it reads: "I'll keep Bryan out of New York this year and you remember me next time."

These paragraphs, to my thinking, outline the political situation before and since the election, and forecast also with unerring certainty the future history of the Democratic and Republican parties. Whatever the character, aims and principles of the candidate he will find himself powerless for good while in the hands of the managers of the political machine, or machines.

These political machines are planned, organized and built for the purpose of robbing the people, and for nothing else. In order to carry out their purpose and to perpetuate their existence it is absolutely necessary that there be two leading parties, managed in the same way and for similar ends. In no other way can politics be made a paying business. In no other way can the people be successfully hoodwinked and plundered.

The only rational cure for the curse of politics is simply to cease voting for and working for the present party machines; cease voting for president and congressmen. Organize no political parties to take the place of the present machinery but instead organize and practicalize local and national co-operative industries; local and national labor exchange societies, on the basis of self-help; ignoring as far as possible the national and state governments with their proteges,—the robber trusts, such as the banking trust, the commercial trusts, the manufacturing trusts, the transportation trusts, the lawyer-and-judge trust, etc., etc.

In this way—the method known as "elimination by substitution," and in this way only as some of us see it, can the curse of politics, the curse of government of man by his fellow man ever be abolished or destroyed.

But will the present race of men ever do this? For one I answer, no! The love of governing; the desire to exploit and rob one's neighbor, is too strong, too deeply rooted in our present human society to allow a general practicalization or adoption of the plans herein outlined. A new and better generation must be born. But where are the mothers wise enough to give birth to the new and better generation?

M. H.

Lois Waisbrooker.

Among the pioneer workers for freedom and justice to mothers, and for the right of children to be born well, few if any better deserve recognition and honorable mention than does the woman whose name heads this paragraph. For more than forty years the name of Lois Waisbrooker,—through her many books and pamphlets, her lectures, and through the columns of the various papers edited and published by her, has been known far and wide as one of the leaders in radical humanitarian reform.

For nearly a year last past Mrs. Waisbrooker has published a little paper in San Francisco, called "Clothed With the Sun." With her slender means and the small income from the paper she has found it difficult to pay rent and other necessary expenses in a large city, and she is now trying to remove her publishing plant to Home, Washington, where, in a little home of her own the heavy item of rent will be eliminated, and where she will get much co-operative help from the co-operators now colonized at that place.

To enable her to make this change and to get properly settled in a new home, a little special effort among her many friends and admirers will be necessary. She asks no donations—although if any one deserves such aid it is Mrs. Waisbrooker—but would be glad to receive orders for her books "Perfect Motherhood" cloth bound, $1; "Helen Harlow's Vow," paper cover, twenty-five cents, and "The Temperance Folly, or Who is the Worst," an able presentation of the Saloon question, price ten cents.

Several boxes of these books have been stored in Lucifer's office and we shall be glad to fill orders for the same at prices named and forward the money to Mrs. Waisbrooker; or money can be sent to her direct by the purchaser, and the orders forwarded to us.

Mrs. Waisbrooker would be glad also to receive subscriptions to her monthly journal, "Clothed With the Sun," price fifty cents per year, a characteristic selection from which paper will be found in this issue of Lucifer, entitled, "My Ideal of Love in Freedom." Subscriptions will be taken at this office for "Clothed With the Sun." New yearly subscribers to Lucifer or renewals for one year at the regular rate can have Mrs. Waisbrooker's paper one year for twenty-five cents.

Holiday Presents.

This is the season honored by immemorial custom as the season for giving and receiving gifts!

This custom is one to be cultivated and encouraged, inasmuch as it serves to humanize, civilize and socialize the race of humankind. It serves not only to cement and make lasting the friendships already begun but also to enlarge the circle of mutually helpful friends. Life would scarcely be enjoyable to the cultured mind were it not for the custom of giving and receiving gifts.

Amid the multifarious temptations to spend money for presents it is often very difficult to decide what to select as most suitable. Jewelry, pictures and articles of wearing apparel have long been popular as tokens of esteem, of friendship or of love.

In this book-making age it is quite common to send books, inscribed with the name of the donor, as holiday presents. Next to the company of the living friend the companionship of a loved and admired writer, as a gift from the absent but cherished friend, would seem to fill the vacant place—much better at least than presents of gold, silver, brilliant stones or costly articles of clothing.

In line with this thought we venture to suggest to the friends and well wishers of Lucifer and its work, the propriety of selecting from our book list, souvenirs for their friends, whether absent or present. Among the books offered by us such as we think would be suitable for this purpose we would respectfully name,

Hilda's Home, by Rosa Graul, 426 pages, cloth, price	$1.00
Cityless and Countryless World, Olerich, cloth,	1.00
Rights of Woman and Sexual Relations, Heinzen cloth	1.00
Perfect Motherhood, Lois Waisbrooker, cloth,	1.00
British Barbarians, Grant Allen, cloth,	1.00
Lucifer, Vol. III New Series, (E. M. 299) cloth,	1.75
Physician in the House, Dr. Greer,	2.50
A year's subscription to Lucifer—unbound	1.00
A year's subscription to the Light-Bearer Library.	.50
Karezza, Dr. Stockham,	1.00
Woman, Church and State, Matilda J. Gage,	1.50

Many others might be mentioned that would doubtless be much prized by the recipient. All of this list—except the weekly Lucifer and monthly Light-Bearer Library, are substantially bound, some of them quite handsomely, in cloth.

In thus calling attention to our book list as suitable material for holiday presents to young and old, we may be a little behind time, but it is hoped not too late. It is never too late to do good, and by so doing practicalize the saying, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," and that other saying, "It blesseth him that gives and him that takes."

A reduction will be made from the prices named when two or more selections are made by the same person.

Lucifer's Winter Campaign.

The Winter Solstice is now with us—the shortest days and longest nights of the year. Winter is pre-eminently the time for reading, for reflection, for sober earnest thought, and for formulating plans for the coming year.

Of the many aids to useful thinking the cheapest and best, perhaps, is the daily or weekly paper; also the monthly or quarterly magazine. These winged messengers come flying into our homes, bringing news from every part of the habitable earth; bringing us the latest thought, the matured, the ripened, up to date thought of the thinkers of the times in which it is our fortune to live.

In the division of labor some must gather up the thoughts of the thinkers and commit them to the care of these winged messengers aforesaid, for distribution or circulation among those who may desire to know to what purpose, or to what effect, other minds have been thinking.

In this department of co-operative labor Lucifer's editors and publishers have been working for near a quarter of the century now closing, and if experience is worth anything we ought by this time to be able to supply to our friends and customers a good bill of fare—in other words, a good selection of the best thought of the best thinkers of the age, or of all the ages, along the lines of thought to which we devote our winged messengers, the weekly Lucifer and the monthly Light-Bearer Library.

That these messengers are appreciated and welcomed in hundreds of homes, and in many lands and climes, is abundantly proved by letters brought to our door by every week's mail. A few of these letters are published, from time to time in our "Voices" column, but most of them never see the light of print, chiefly because of their personal character. From one of these personal letters we venture here to quote a few lines. A comparatively new subscriber, a very intelligent young mother, writes from a small town "way down in Maine," a long and well penned letter in which among other words of apparently heartfelt appreciation she says,

"Enclosed find two dollars, one for the story of your life and one to credit on Lucifer, though my subscription has not expired. I hope it never will. I said to my sister, recently, 'I will take that paper until my little boy (now five years old) is twenty-one, if I have to go without bread, for the lofty tone and character of Lucifer can be conducive only to good, and will help to develop the good and beautiful in my child. There is scarcely a day that I do not say or think, 'God bless Mr. Harman for what he is doing to emancipate the human family,' and I am ever grateful for the sample copies of Lucifer that first called my attention to this great work, and I feel that to your memory should the women of this land raise a monument, not of granite but of holy thoughts chiseled from your own words: 'Every woman should be the owner of her own body,' etc. It is ignorance and thoughtlessness that have so debased the marriage relation. How I wish I were able to hold up your hands financially, but alas I am poor in this world's goods though rich in thoughts of love which I freely give to you in your holy work. Lucifer comes into my home bearing, more than all other papers, an inspiration born in the realms of purity. I love the paper; I love the man who sits at the helm; I love the daughter who so nobly assists; also all the noble writers who write for truth's sake. My sister is one of the many who bless you for light and liberty. She has five beautiful children and she says she longs to bring them up according to the holy light and wisdom of Lucifer's teachings. This is personal and meant only for you and your daughter."

The writer of the above lines will please pardon the liberty I have taken. Not for its personal reference but because in no other way can the fact be so well shown that Lucifer's work and its workers are now appreciated by many true-hearted and cultured women, have I taken such liberty with private correspondence. In no other way can be so well shown the utility of sending out sample copies.

Encouraged by letters such as this from which I have freely quoted we again ask all who take an interest in Lucifer's campaign of education to send us names of their personal acquaintances, especially the names of mothers, whether they are now thinkers along Lucifer's lines or not. Perhaps a sample copy may have the effect of setting them to thinking as they have never thought before. As our correspondent well says, it is ignorance and thoughtlessness that are responsible for the enslavement of womanhood and the consequent degradation of the race. M. H.

A Clean Balance Sheet

"Owe no man anything but love," is a good motto in business affairs, as well as all other affairs.

While the business of Lucifer's office is increasing at a gratifying rate the showing of our balance sheet is not just what we could wish it to be.

A clean balance sheet, like unto a clean conscience, is a very desirable possession.

Will our friends and patrons help us to begin the new year and the new century with a good balance on the right side of the ledger?

To do this it is only necessary to see that the balance sheet of each subscriber and patron is rightly adjusted.

Adjustment is a good word. It is closely allied to JUSTICE, one of the cardinal virtues.

If our political bosses will only quit meddling with the monetary affairs of the working people we can adjust our business to almost any basis of circulating medium.

PERMANENCE is what is needed, rather than perpetual change, in the currency of the country.

Postal notes, postage stamps, silver and gold coins, express company orders, greenbacks, silver and gold certificates, bank drafts payable in Chicago or New York, are all receivable in settling accounts with Lucifer's office, so as to enable us to begin the new year and the new century with a clean and satisfactory balance sheet.

Help Wanted.

Complaints have occasionally reached this office in regard to lack of promptness in filling orders, also in giving proper credit on mailing list etc. One chief cause of these delays has been lack of suitable help in the clerical and mechanical departments.

In order to meet the demands of our increasing business, and to enable the editor to finish his long promised autobiography, we wish to engage the services of a competent helper. One that can set type, work a type writer, use the pen, assist in the mailing department, etc., etc., preferred. Though the possession of all these qualifications is not absolutely required it is very desirable that the applicant should be in full sympathy with our work and be willing and anxious to make herself or himself efficiently useful in all possible ways. Address, with references, this office.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Mattie Coy, Monson, Me.:—You will find enclosed $1 for Lucifer. I thank you very much for your kindness. Lucifer has been a great help to me.

H. C. G., Chicago:—I see that the church in Indiana wants more stringent slavery laws wound about married (?) couples so as to keep them in hell more securely. The church don't mean to have freedom for anybody. Liberty for an aspiring soul shall be suppressed.

Wm. Fretz, Trenton, N. J.:—In regard to the project of running "Continued Stories" in Lucifer I would say "don't do it"! Short, crisp essays from men and women upon current social events I think would be preferred by the majority of readers, while the space in the paper is limited. This will give a better chance for every county to be heard from.

J. A. Wilson, Pasadena, Calif.:—You ought to be out here in this glorious climate. There is nothing like it. It is neither hot nor cold. I am one thousand feet above the sea, near the Sierra Madre mountains. I wish you could be persuaded to move your business to this part of the country and help to colonize radicals here. If you have any readers in Southern California I would be pleased to have them drop me a line so that I can make their acquaintance. I enclose fifty cents for which please extend my subscription six months, and fifty cents for which please send me the "Report of Chicago Conference on Trusts."

A. D. Clark, St. Louis, Mo.:—Your marked copy of Lucifer, issue of the 8th. inst., calling attention to the need of new subscribers for The Light-Bearer Library, duly received. I take pleasure in remitting herewith fifty cents for the Library for one year, to begin with No. 1, Vol. I.

When "Koresh" began his career in Chicago some years ago I attended several of his lectures and have read more or less of the literature of "Koreshanity" ever since. The whole idea was inexplicable to me until I perused the very lucid explanation of it by Mr. Crane in the above issue of your valuable publication.

Edward S. Pilsworth, Detroit, Mich.:—I enclose $2.40, to renew my subscription on Lucifer and for the following books. My time ran out with No. 831, but I was moving from Battle Creek up here, and did not know it until a bunch of Lucifers arrived. I wish to apologize for keeping you waiting, and to thank you for not stopping the paper.

[Our usual method is to continue sending until ordered to stop, believing that all who do not so order will pay for the paper when convenient to do so. We are in receipt of many letters similar to that of Bro. Pilsworth, thanking us for not stopping their Lucifer when time expired. M. H.]

F. W. Wardall, Weyerhauser, Wis.:—I sincerely hope and trust that you will get the required number of subscribers [to the Light-Bearer Library to meet the new ruling of the P. O., Department. Enclosed find stamps for two subscribers to the Library, as per offer in last Lucifer.

[Six months for ten cents to paid up subscribers to Lucifer.]

C. Slosbauer, Tacoma, Wash.:—Lucifer is an able exponen of philosophic anarchy. With the signers of the Declaration of Independence, we, the Philosophic Anarchists, assert the self-evident truth that all men, (regardless of race or sex), are created with certain inalienable rights, namely, life, liberty and pursuit of happiness. We are grateful that in this mightiest of nations, the American Republic, we have freedom of thought and speech. We appreciate the kindness, and courtesy, and protection of the American people in allowing us to vindicate our political convictions; a freedom that unfortunately is denied our comrades in many other nations.

Ralph C. Clyde, Portland, Oregon:—Enclosed you will please find a list of names and a few stamps for postage to send sample copies of the Morning Star as per your request in Lucifer of November 17, 1900. Would also advise you to send them sample copies of the "Only" Lucifer.

[The list of names was accompanied by thirty cents in stamps to pay postage on same. Friend Clyde seems not to understand that our "Morning Star" and Lucifer are one and the same—Lucifer being the ancient name of the Morning Star, so named because it heralds the dawn. Sincerely thanking our good friend for his co-operative aid we respectfully suggest to all readers of Lucifer that a similar letter from each of Lucifer's readers would do much, as we view the matter, towards heralding the dawn of a better day for mankind. M. H.]

Light-Bearer Library.

While in response to our recent offer of six months subscription to the Light-Bearer Library for ten cents to paid up subscribers to Lucifer, new names for the Library have been coming in quite freely we still fail so be able to report a sufficient number of bona fide paying subscribers to entitle us, under the new ruling, to print the usual edition and still have the benefit of second class postage.

In the hope that the required number would soon be received we have delayed our report to the P. O. department, beyond the time named for the appearance of No. 9.

Hoping that this explanation will be satisfactory we renew the offer of six numbers of the monthly Library for ten cents to all paid up subscribers to Lucifer.

All institutions are finally conservative. The Church, the State, the University, the learned Associations, however they may have originated in opposition to orthodoxy, eventually crystallize into barriers to human advance. The Protestants made an attack on conservative Rome, but as soon as they established themselves, they resisted further innovation and have since been conservative to the core. The same is true of all heterodoxies which, as time goes on, become orthodoxies.—Orford Northcote in "Ruled by the Tomb."

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint: A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution, its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. Our Purpose.

Lucifer's work, Lucifer's mission, is to lay bare the hidden causes, the fundamental or underlying causes, of the prevalence of crime, of vice, of poverty and misery with which the race of humankind is now afflicted.

As some of us see it, the remedies recommended by our "Single Tax" reformers, our "Coming Nation," or Edward Bellamy reformers, our "Appeal to Reason" or State Socialistic reformers, our "Social Purity" or W. C. T U. reformers, the state regulation of the liquor traffic reformers, etc., etc., are al more or less superficial and unphilosophic in their methods of social regeneration. As we see it, all of these zealous and well meaning workers in the field of humanitarian reform ignore and neglect, more or less completely, the basic cause of all human inequalities, oppressions and slaveries. All these workers seem to forget the axiomatic truth that the institutions, the laws and customs of any people are on a plane with the people who make them or who accept them from previous generations, and that hence the only rational way to get better institutions is first to get better people, and they forget that other axiomatic saying—'to reform a man we must begin with his grandmother."

This then is Lucifer's central mission, this is Lucifer's chosen field, namely, to rouse the women, the mothers of the race, to a sense of their responsibility in the work of social regeneration and to rouse the men, the fathers of the race to a sense of their responsibility in providing proper conditions to enable the mothers to do their perfect work.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do no all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed?

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents

What The Young Need to Know: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lilian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers; 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Paper covers 50 cents. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home. By Rosa Graul. "Another true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

Love in Freedom,

By M. HARMAN.

CONTENTS.

Freedom, Love, Wisdom—the Newer and Better Trinity: Freedom of Choice Unlimited as to Time: Free Love Tautological, Bound Love a Misnomer; Marriage Opposes Truth, Justice and Purity; Evolution and Marriage; Marriage Legalizes Rape: Marriage an Unequal Yoke; Marriage a type of Government; Monogamy of Birds. THE EDUCATION OF THE FEMININE WILL.

BY MLLE. HARLOR.

"To be able to reason and to have pride is superfluous for one who is only to obey. . . . Reason is the liberator of conscience"—p. 7.

"Not only is it necessary to claim economic emancipation; it is necessary to preach moral emancipation at the same time and with equal force. It must be said that the first without the second would be three-quarters poison, and that the decisive revolution is the inward revolution. . . . Resignation is the perpetual avowal of impotency."—pp. 9, 11.

A wonderfully clear and strong exposition of the demands of awakened womanhood—by a self-reliant, self-respecting woman.

Price three cents each; per dozen for distribution twenty five cents.

Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness and progress.—From the Preface.

The British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to justly earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS.

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely bound on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth $1.

A PHYSICIAN IN THE HOUSE.

A New Family Medical Work, by Dr. J. H. Greer.

This book is up-to-date in every particular.
It will save you hundreds of dollars in doctors' bills.
It tells you how to cure yourself by simple and harmless home remedies.
It recommends no poisonous or dangerous drugs.
It teaches how to save health and life by safe methods.
It teaches prevention—that it is better to know how to live and avoid disease than to take any medicine as a cure.
It is not an advertisement and has no medicine to sell.
It has hundreds of excellent recipes for the cure of the various diseases.
It has 16 colored plates, showing different parts of the human body.
The chapter on Painless Midwifery is worth its weight in gold to women.
The "Care of Children" is something every mother ought to read.
It teaches the value of Air, Sunshine, and Water as medicines.
It contains valuable information for the married.

This book cannot fail to please you. If you are looking for health by the safest and easiest means, do not delay getting it It has eight hundred pages, is neatly bound in cloth with gold letters, and will be sent by mail or express, prepaid to any address for $2.50. Address M Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

KAREZZA Ethics of Marriage. A bold, brave book teaching ideal marriage, rights of the unborn child, a designed and controlled maternity.

"Union Signal": Thousands of women have blessed Dr. Stockham for Tokology, thousands of men and women will bless her for Karezza.

"Arena": Karezza is worth its weight in gold.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. IV., No. 51. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, JAN. 4, E. M. 400. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE No. 846.

To Mothers.

In the name of your ages of anguish!
In the name of the curse and the stain!
By the strength of your sorrow I call you!
By the power of your pain!

We are mothers. Through us in our bondage,
Through us with a brand in the face,
Be we fettered with gold or with iron,
Through us comes the race!

With the weight of all sin on our shoulders,
Midst the serpents of shame ever curled,
We have sat, unresisting, defenseless,—
Making the men of the world!

We were ignorant long, and our children
Were besotted and brutish and blind;
King-driven, priest-ridden,--who are they?
Our children—mankind.

We were kept for our beauty, our softness,
Our sex,--what reward do ye find?
We transmit, must transmit, being mothers,
What we are to mankind!

As the mother so follow the children!
No nation wise, noble and brave,
Ever sprang,--though the father had freedom,--
From the mother,--a slave.

Look now at the world as ye find it!
Blench not! Truth is kinder than lies!
Look now at the world—see it suffer!
Listen now to its cries!

See the people who suffer, all people!
All humanity wasting its powers
In a hand to hand struggle—death dealing—
All children of ours!

The blind millionaire—the blind harlot—
The blind preacher leading the blind—
Only think of their pain, how it hurts them!
Our little blind babies--mankind!

Shall we bear it? We mothers who love them;
Can we bear it? We mothers who feel
Every pang of our babes and forgive them
Every sin when they kneel?

Little stumbling world! You have fallen!
You are erring in darkness and fear!
Wait darling—your mother is coming!
Hush darling your mother is here!

We are here like an army with banners!
The great flag of our freedom unfurled!
With us rests the fate of the nations,
For we make the world!

Dare ye sleep while your children are calling?
Dare ye wait while they clamor unfed?
Dare ye pray in the proud pillared churches
While they suffer for bread?

If the father hath sinned he shall answer.
If he check thee laugh back at his powers!
Shall a mother be kept from her children?
These people are ours!

They are ours! He is ours, for we made him!
In our arms he has nestled and smiled!
Shall we, the world-mothers be hindered
By the freaks of a child?

Rise now in the power of The Woman!
Rise now in the power of our need!
The world cries in hunger and darkness!
We shall light! We shall feed!

In the name of our ages of anguish!
In the name of the curse and the stain!
By the strength of our sorrow we conquer!
In the power of our pain!

George Macdonald on Vice Crusades.

"Truth Seeker," New York.

As the only citizen of New York who does not know how the social evil can be either abolished or restrained, I feel that I am qualified to write upon the subject. Men in the line of business of Comstock and Parkhurst are in a position to get first-hand information about vice. They have the means to pay all the inmates of a house of joy to parade before them as God in his wisdom created the same, but a man on my salary can't afford the luxury. When the deacon read about the multitude of wives permitted by Providence to the patriarchs he exclaimed, "What advantages them early Christians enjoyed." And so I have to remark of the individuals I have named that they enjoy privileges beyond my reach. I sometimes think that if I had not been created a man I would like to be a minister of the gospel or the agent of a vice society.

In the days before the modern vice crusade was inaugurated by the pulpit, the social evil and its indulgers seemed much more remote from the doors of the virtuous than at present. Then one could "live into a tenement" and have only the good for neighbors. An apartment or two might be occupied by a single woman who boarded her "brother," a policeman, but there was no vice, so-called. I lived for years in a house where all the apartments were filled by families, with the trifling exception above noted. I knew that in the unexplored distance there were haunts of vice that caused certain streets to be lightly spoken of. Immorality was localized, and if it came under your nose it was because you pointed your nose that way and followed it. But all things come to him who waits, and pretty soon the tenement dweller found himself under no necessity of leaving his own hired roof in order to be bad. The parsons discovered the nests of doves that were soiled, and insisted on their being dispersed by the police. There was a consequent fluttering, and when the birds settled they were in the tenements. They had fellows with them they called their "husbands," who were all loafers and mostly thieves. I lost a suit of clothes and an overcoat before I discovered that under the reign of purity it was necessary to fasten the fanlights with screws and to have a spring-lock on the door. About the time the eruptions of vice in those quarters were becoming confluent I moved.

The primary cause of this condition of affairs was of course the scattering actuated by the pure. A contributory cause was the encroachment of business, which tore down the old-fashioned houses adapted to the uses of vice and put up sky-scrapers in which articles of clothing and adornment were manufactured and many working girls employed. I recall the remark of Hugh O. Pentecost that the girls now seen in these districts do not appear to be so well-nourished nor so happy as their predecessors.

I feel thankful for the train of thought, started a numer of years ago, which finally led me to the conclusion that I am not under any obligation to discover and dispense a remedy for social ills. There was once a sick man corked upin a close room that was opened only to admit the doctor and the minister. Getting no better, he resolved to stop praying and throw his medicines out of the window. He did so, and the air that entered through the window when he opened it brought about his recovery. If a community sick of vice would dismiss its clerical and political quacks and expose the disease to the action of the unimprisoned air, the patient might improve. Vice is its own punishment, and if virtue is not always rewarded, it certainly is not visited with any of those penalties that follow a reckless life. Nature has shown herself competent to avenge her own outrages, and my confidence in her would not be increased though she were a member of the legislature or in the direct line of apostolic succession through the laying on of hands.

What Is It to Be Well Born?

BY LILLIE D. WHITE.

This is a question that puzzles me exceedingly and I search in vain even in Lucifer for a satisfactory answer.

In Lucifer No. 840 Mr. Harman says: "The simple fact is that a large and growing criminal class is a necessity to our system of government, and hence the conspiracy of the ruling classes to close the doors of reform against all who are so unfortunate as to be once branded with a 'criminal record.'" With this I agree. Further on we gather that the victims of this conspiracy are such because they have been "deprived of the right to be born well." He gives as an illustration a poor, hungry wretch with a bad-shaped head who begs at his door for something to eat His bad-shaped head and other evidences mark him as one of the disinherited, with tendencies toward the criminal type. (They are both the same as far as the "necessity" and the "conspiracy" are concerned.)

Now I feel myself very closely related to this hungry fellow in spite of his bad-shaped head, for I am in nearly the same fix. I am one of the disinherited. I do not own a foot of land nor a dollar's worth of property. I haven't a week's security this side of starvation or his condition, if I was disabled or thrown out of a job. Yet I have a good-shaped head and was well born; that is, I was welcome, was one of a small family. My mother was not overburdened with maternity, was devoted to and was happy with her children. I had a free, happy childhood, have always had good health, energy and industry. Yet I am in the same class with the hungry beggar. What signifies a few degrees of destitution and want?

I do not intend to be personal, but speak in behalf of the millions of disinherited who can say the same—millions of victims of the conspiracy who have good-shaped heads and were well-born.

I cannot believe the shape of the head has much to do with one's condition in life, for there are a great many men among the successful, powerful and prosperous who have villainous shaped-heads, and there are most villainous things done every day by men with good shaped heads.

But what is the process, what the conditions necessary for the well-born child? Mr. Harman talks of free motherhood, free women, free choice of fathers, and repeatedly quotes Ingersoll, "Woman the owner, the mistress of herself"—all of which I indorse, for I do not believe in the ownership or tyranny of any one person over another—but is it "the solution of the whole question"? Is woman herself so powerful, so good, so scientific, so wise that she needs only to be let alone to produce perfect beings who cannot be made victims of the conspiracies of the ruling classes?

B. F. Robbins in same issue outlines a plan for being well born. But would any strong, self-respecting, sensible, free woman ask or accept such conditions for motherhood? Must women be treated like unreasoning, whimsical, irresponsible things, accepting unreasonable indulgence and sacrifice from others for the sake of a well-born child? Would such conditions insure a well-born child?

In my opinion, the unreasonable, whimsical, selfish woman, whether kept contented or not, would have the same kind of a child—at least not one at all fitted to deal with and overcome the conspiracies of the ruling classes. I should expect more from the child of the strong, self-reliant, reasonable woman, even if born under the worst of conditions, its natal influences being the stress and storm of life's deepest sorrows and struggles.

Seventy and eighty years ago women were more enslaved by the church, the will of God and rule of husbands than they are now. They bore families of from ten to twenty children without a thought of science or self-ownership. I wonder what the effect would have been if women had had a good grasp of "science" in those days that would have made it possible to refuse to bear children. For it is not likely that they really wanted so many children in the poverty and hardships of that time, but they had strong, stalwart sons and daughters who laid the foundations of our grand civilization (?) of today. If it really was the most important thing to be done—to populate and cultivate the land—it seems to me the thing was pretty well managed.

Ever since our pioneer days the tendency of reproduction has been toward smaller families, the freedom and self ownership of women, a scientific (and unscientific) knowledge and control of propagation—all requirements of being well born—yet "crimes and criminals are rapidly on the increase, far more rapidly in proportion than population," and the solution of the whole question, according to Ingersoll and Harman, is to be well born! Yet they do not tell us and no one knows just what that means. The best known rules of stirpiculture have so often produced bad results they cannot be depended upon.

Mr. Harman has said so many good things and made such a noble fight in woman's behalf, and I have received so much of value from his teachings, that I am reluctant to appear to criticise or even differ from him, but I know he advocates hearing all sides and asks for different opinions on all subjects. I am earnestly seeking for truth and have no positive opinion that I am not ready to leave when convinced it is wrong.

Is the Universe Cellular?

BY C. P. H.

The "Flaming Sword" has replied to my criticism. I quote:

"Turn the last page of "The Flaming Sword" with the top to the right; imagine an observer standing directly beneath the moon at 'Third Quarter,' in the central diagram. Let the visual ray follow the curve of the solar ray, and the sun will be seen on a level with the eye; it is rising then If it were Polaris [North Star] being viewed from the equator, it would appear on the horizon for the same reason, and would rise one degree for every degree of latitude covered in progress toward the north. Take the same visual curve to 42 degrees north latitude, and it will extend 42 degrees beyond the North Star, and the entire surface of 42 degrees radius will be embraced in the field of the circle of perpetual apparition; and none of the stars will appear to be 'on the edge of things,' because the limit of vision on the star sphere is at the horizon, for the reason that the space between the heavens and the earth at the distant point of rising and setting of sun or star, is vanished by perspective."

I replied as follows:

EDITOR "FLAMING SWORD:"—I have read your reply to my criticism. If at 42 degrees north latitude the visual curve extends 42 degrees beyond the north star, any star at that point will appear at the horizon, and the stars in this circle of perpetual apparition which are nearer to the observer will appear the highest from the horizon. This "circle" then, is simply reversed, as though it were taken from the north section of the sphere and set before the observer to the north of him, where he can view the whole of it in the same way that he could do if the old idea of light radiation in straight lines were true. This is a valid conclusion from your conditions; but if so, then the motion of this "circle" would be also reversed, and we would observe that it turns in a direction opposite to that of the rest of the starry sphere. Such is not actually the case.

Although you say that light is not propagated in straight lines, the line that separates the light and dark portions of your diagrams is about as straight as a line can be made.

You say that the reason the sun, or a star appears on the horizon is that "the space between the heavens and the earth is vanished by perspective." This space you place at 1000 miles. In your book you say that an object vanishes in perspective at a distance of 3000 times its size. Yet this space of 1000 miles vanishes at a distance six times its size, and the sun, instead of vanishing at the distance, does not even diminish in size, although it is but 100 miles in diameter. This is, I think, the funniest part of your entire comedy, funnier even than those cunning little mercurial disks that float about between your metal layers of the "shell," (regardless of the law of friction) to produce eclipses.

A practical use for your "system" might be that we could invent some way of shooting Fillipinos without going away from home, and we need not mind very much if the zenith does get perforated by bullets.

Witch-Slayers Not All Dead Yet

BY HELENE VIOLET.

The issue of Lucifer dated Dec. 22, E. M. 300 made me very proud of the manly man at its helm because of his incisive arraignment of the core of woman's enthrallment—Christianity. So long as the burden of woman-dominating Christianity is carried, so long will woman be a sexual and social slave. From the Dayton, (O.) "Daily News" of Dec. 25, 1900, let me quote.

"WOMAN MURDERED AS A WITCH!

Washington, Dec. 25.—News has been received at the war department of a peculiarly atrocious murder. It appears from the testimony, that two of the prisoners were responsible for the death of the wife of one of their neighbors. With seven or eight other men, they went to the house of Victor Pere, and forcibly took him and his wife to the river, where they bound their hands behind them, and told them that their 'last day had come.'

"The woman was struck, and her dead body thrown into the river. Her husband witnessed her murder, and anticipated similar treatment. He sprang into the river, and notwithstanding his arms were pinioned, managed to reach the opposite shore. According to the witness, the motive for the crime was a superstitious belief that the murdered woman was a witch, possessed the occult powers whereby she in some mysterious way had brought about the death of a neighbor's child.

"The men were sentenced to be hanged [for obeying the bible?] but the sentence in each case was mitigated to confinement at hard labor for twenty years out of consideration for the exceedingly low order of intelligence and blind superstition of the accused."

Comment upon the above is unneeded; it speaks for itself. Those who killed that woman were obeying the specific command of God. Where Christianity has power to carry out the mandates of the Jewish deity, Liberty is suppressed, and the lives of neither men or women can be safe.

[The clipping from which our correspondent quotes does not say where or when the murder was committed. In a private note she promises to mail the entire clipping to us if its authenticity should be questioned. M. H.]

Do You Know—

"That in thirty-seven of these United States a married mother has no legal right to her children?

"That in sixteen states a wife has no right to her own earnings outside of the home?

"That in eight states a woman has no right to her own property after marriage?

"That in seven states there is no law compelling a man to support his own family?

"Discussing these things the New York Journal is led to remark:

"'If women who bear children, who nurse them in sickness, whose existence is bound up in babyhood, have no right to their babies, who on earth has?

"'It seems a strange fact that the remarkable legislators who passed this law in thirty-seven states were once babies themselves. Perhaps the curriculum of an incubator would have made them think and act differently.

"'And why should not a wife have a right to her own earnings? What justice is there in that law which prevails in sixteen states which allow a recreant and drunken husband to despoil his wife of the money she has earned?

"'Who gave the small atom shaped after the fashion o Adam the right to oppress and bulldoze the smaller atom shaped after the fashion of Eve?

"'Not less idiotic is the law prevailing in eight states which takes away the right of a woman to her own property after marriage. Thus the marriage law in these states may be made the vehicle of downright thievery by men who care nothing for the sanctity of the vow.'"

The Effect of Uniform Divorce Laws.

E. C. Walker, in "Brann's Iconoclast."

The movement for a national law of marriage and divorce is a movement to bind back the progressive states to the dead mass of the inert communities. It is an attempt to kill out differentiation, to put the comparatively free states of the west into the same category with South Carolina, where divorce is absolutely forbidden. This is proved by the fact that the promoters of the scheme are the rabid enemies of divorce; if they imagined that a national law on marriage and divorce would result in liberalizing divorce laws on the whole, they would not say a word or lift a finger in the attempt to secure a national law on the subject. Their very attitude unmasks them. They stand committed to the policy of doing everything they can to compel persons who desire to be apart to live together, to force undesired and repulsive relations upon wives, to bring into the world the greatest possible number of children who will be the children of constraint and disgust rather than the children of liberty and glad love. Still more briefly and distinctly, they are determined that the unhappy wife shall be raped at will by her husband to the day of her death or accept the alternative of isolation and heart-hunger. To be sure, she may become a prostitute; if she resorts to this, they will hound her to her grave, but she will revenge herself to the full on their beloved society.

This, then is the gospel of glad tidings which the advocates of no-divorce bring to the wife who cannot live happily with the man to whom the law has bound her: "Submit to rape, accept perpetual celibacy, or become an outcast." Blessed moral reformers! And to the husband: "Associate with your wife, whether she is willing or not, whether you love her or not; or suppress your manhood to the end of life, or buy transient pleasure and deadly disease of the woman of the street—one of these three courses only shall be open to you, by command of the saints, meaning ourselves." Blessed moral reformers.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have just had it printed as a leaflet and are sure that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" which also appear in this issue make another leaflet worthy a wide circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

The New Year and the New Century.

The division of time into days, weeks, months and years, has its basis or reason in nature. The revolution of the earth round the sun, according to the Copernican astronomy, divides time into years. The revolution of the earth on its axis divides time into days, the revolution of the moon round the earth into months (moonths) and the change of appearance of the moon—new, full and half-full—divides time into weeks.

While these divisions have their basis in natural phenomena the time or season of beginning the year, and the number and length of the months, are largely arbitrary or conventional. The old Romans began their year in the Spring, or at the opening of warm weather in the northern hemisphere, as shown by the names of some of their months—September meaning the seventh month, October the eighth, November the ninth and December the tenth, instead of the ninth, tenth, eleventh and twelfth, as with us. The length of the month was changed by them from the lunar four weeks to varying lengths—twenty-eight to thirty-one days.

Likewise the Hebrews, the Mohammedans, the Chinese, etc., have each their peculiar customs as to seasons for beginning the year, also their own arrangement of months.

Our year begins about ten days after the winter solstice—sun-stand. It would seem more reasonable to have it begin immediately after the solstice, or when the sun seems to begin its annual northern journey. If I mistake not the day celebrated as New Year was established by the Roman hierarchy, and was put one week later than Christmas, which festival had already been adopted from older religions—the festival instituted before the dawn of authentic history to celebrate the new birth of the Sungod, thus showing the analogy or kinship between Christianity and the ancient forms of sun-worship.

The origin of the custom of dividing the years into centuries and millenniums is also largely arbitrary and conventional, having little or no basis in the facts of nature. The word century means simply one hundred, or the first multiple of the number of digits on the two hands. The century or hundred years just closed is called the nineteenth century by Christians, not because there is anything in the motions of the earth, the sun, the moon, the stars, or anything else in nature, that authorizes such divison, but simply because the Christian chronologists needed a starting point from which to reckon years, and as the first martyr or chief hero of the Christian system is supposed to have been born about nineteen hundred years ago these historians fixed upon that supposed event as the initial year of their calendar, or chronological era.

I say "supposed event" because churchmen themselves are by no means agreed as to the year or time of year in which the Nazarene was born. It is now generally conceded that the common calendar is wrong by at leart four years, and no real scholar pretends to believe that Christmas is the anniversary of the birth of Jesus, called the "Christ," or the Anointed. Moreover, but few scholars are willing to risk their reputation as such by claiming that the Judean Jesus is an historical personage, as Julius Caesar, Aristotle or Plato is an historical personage.

All this ado, then, that we hear so much of, over the death of the old century and the birth of the new, is seen to have no basis whatever, so far as nature and reason are concerned; no more in fact than Santa Claus and Mother Goose stories have a basis in nature or reason. The "Nineteenth Century" is not a fact in nature, as stars and suns and persons and events are facts in nature. The nineteenth and twentieth centuries are figments of the imagination, just as goblins and ghosts in nursery tales are figments of the imagination. These "bogies" of our childhood are invented to amuse and also to keep in subjection the immature minds of children; is it not much the same with the figments known as the centuries of the Christian era? When these are spoken of as separate entities, having each characteristics—if not personalities—of their very own, is it not for the purpose of hoodwinking and holding in awe the great masses of people, so that their cunning masters can the more securely exploit and rob them?

Of course we need to divide time into periods for convenience, but to spend money and time in celebrating the death of the old year and old century, as though these had individual existence or entities of their own, shows that, as a race, we have not yet evoluted beyond the kindergarten age, or the age of childish ignorance and superstition.

When will the age of childish ignorance and superstition be exchanged for the age of science and reason, the age of adolescent womanhood and manhood?

This long and somewhat prosy article is written on New Year's day, 1901, of the unscientific and unreliable Christian chronology, or 301 years since Giordano Bruno—the noble martyr to science and manly indedendence, as against ignorance and unmanly submission to priestly domination, suffered the most terrible death, that of burning, at the hands of the Christian Roman hierarchy. Because the Christian chronology is unscientific, superstitious and unreliable some of us prefer to date our letters and our journals "E. M. 301"—Era of Man 301, instead of "Era of Christ 1901."

With this brief explanation of our method of dating, we close what was intended simply as a New Year's greeting from Lucifer's band of home workers, here in Chicago, to its many readers, scattered as they are in many lands and climes—from the frozen Arctic zone to the torrid regions of eternal summer, and from Maine to California an dMexico and from London to South Australia and the Philippines—to all of these we send not merely the stereotyped "Happy New Year!" but rather a huge telepathic wave of good thoughts and fraternal feeling, which if interpreted in words would read something like this:

"May the incoming year bring joy, gladness and prosperity to every one of you, and may you live to see at least a hundred happy returns of January First, if you care to tarry on earth so long!" THE LUCIFER WORKERS.

"Plain Words on the Woman Question."

Number Nine of the monthly Light-Bearer Library, with the above title, was mailed to subscribers December 31. As previously explained the subscribers lose nothing by delay of the publisher except the time and patience lost in waiting.

"All good things come to those who wait," saith the proverb. It is hoped all readers of the delayed number will feel themselves rewarded for their exercise of the "grace of patience." The essay, by Grant Allen, on the responsibility of woman in race-reproduction is regarded as one of the masterpieces of this famous writer, and the comments thereon by Edwin C. Walker are terse and g the core of the tremendously important problem. Price 5 cents per copy or fifty cents per year, of twelve numbers.

Brief Replies to Correspondents.

TO FRANK REED.

Mr. Reed's letter, found in "Voices" column, has shared the fate of many others—been set in type and then side-tracked for weeks if not months, for lack of room in Lucifer's forms. Since Mr. Shepherd declines to continue the discussion with Mr. Reed in regard to "Pre-Nuptial Contracts" I will just say that to my thinking "precautionary measures" are just as proper and needful in nuptial as in any other contracts—if not more so; because of their greater influence—for weal or woe—upon the lives of the contracting parties. To provide against a cessation of love between the parties is not to doubt the honesty or truthfulness of either party, or the genuineness of their love for each other, but simply to acknowledge themselves human. Instead of causing each to distrust the other the fact of such pre-nuptial agreement to separate as friends when conjugal love has ceased to bind, would naturally make each more careful to conserve and hold the love of the other. Each would then be put upon his or her good behavior, instead of, as now, being practically told to abuse and neglect each other as much as they please, because, forsooth, they have taken each other for life,—"for better or worse"—and if either proves the worse there is no release from the nuptial bond but by death or through the scandal and exposure of a divorce court.

Instead of a talisman to make love eternal the vow of life-long fidelity proves, in practice, the very worst of all foes to the permanence of conjugal love.

As to the "Examining board" for candidates with matrimonial intentions there could be no objection to such examination if perfectly voluntary on the part of the candidates themselves, but if compulsory I would say, No—with a big N! H. W. Beecher was right when he said, "Paternal government is infernal government!" We have altogether too much of this sort of government now. An intelligent sense of responsibility to self and to the unborn, with ample opportunity to correct mistakes when found to be such, would be infinitely better than state or church regulation of marriage could be.

That most present day marriages—contract or no contract—are formed to gratify passional impulse—"base of the brain," rather than from intelligent choice, is most sadly true, but who or what is to blame for this? As some of us see it our marriage laws and superstitions are chiefly responsible. A vast majority of the children born in marriage are not wanted, not born of love, but born of parents who had lost their conjugal love for each other, if there ever was any conjugal love between them. From such sowing, what must the harvest be?

In regard to the economic factor in the problem we do not greatly differ. As frequently said, however, in these columns it is far more easy to achieve financial independence, or competence, bad as our economic environment is, than it is to free ourselves from the chains of law and custom in regard to what is right, moral and "pure" in the conjugal or marital relations of men and women.

TO MRS. L. D. WHITE.

Mrs. White's article entitled "What is it to be Well Born?" is so pessimistic, so hopeless in tone that her many friends have good reason to think she made a sad mistake when leaving Chicago to sojourn in Louisiana. Regarding her present mental status as decidedly morbid I would much prefer to say something cheerful and encouraging in reply rather than, by sharp rejoinders, increase her mental disquietude. A very few of her points will therefore be noticed in this issue.

Yes, I think R. G. Ingersoll's view is substantially correct when he says the freedom of woman is the solution of the whole question. The freedom of woman involves and includes an intelligent sense of personal responsibility, to herself and to the race, on the part of woman, for without this it is safe to assume that she can never be free. Free, intelligent, responsible, self-reliant, motherhood includes and insures free intelligent, self-reliant sons—like mother like son. Such sons will neither rule and rob others nor submit to be ruled and robbed by others. Hence the freedom of woman is "the solution of the whole question."

"What signifies a few degrees of destitution and want?" says my friendly critic. To my thinking the difference is ocean wide between the destitution of one who, like Mrs. White, though landless and moneyless, is rich in friends, rich in good deeds, altruistic deeds, laid up against time of need—on the one hand, and on the other the destitution of the woman who lately called at our door begging for a penny, and saying she had no friends, no kindred—"none left but myself and God"!

As to the "shape of the head:" While it is true that a man may have a "villainously-shaped" head and still be successful in life and another may have a well-shaped head and still be a villain, yet the general truth remains that shape as well as quality of brain has much to do with character, and with success in life. Compare the head of the average idiot with that of Daniel Webster or of H. W. Beecher, for illustration. Do we not all instinctively judge a new acquaintance by the shape and size of the head?

To compare the results of propagation under the comparatively free and normal conditions of a century ago or less, in this country, with results under the abnormal conditions and artificial culture of today, is unfair and misleading, unless all the factors of the problem are considered, and for this I have no time for this paper, and close by freely admitting that the question, "What is it to be Born Well" is a most puzzling one. Yes, of all the problems that now confront the sociologist and humanitarian, none can take precedence of this, and of its cognate question, how to utilize the lessons that are brought home to us by the facts of experience and observation in the field of stirpiculture. Men, Women and Emotions.

BY LILLIE D. WHITE.

Some radicals seem to think that no one is deserving of the name who says or does anything that conservatives say or do. A regard for cleanliness and personal appearances, ordinary politeness and honest dealing are booted at as silly conventionalities. They despise a love of home and family, stability of character, constancy and reliability because the Philistines assume to possess these virtues.

They see a conservative spirit hovering over a woman who wears long skirts and says "thank you," or who sees anything in the conventional world worth saving.

A miser is not an admirable character, neither is a spendthrift. They might be likened to the (legal or illegal) monogamist who monopolizes, controls and swallows up his mate, and the butterfly varietist who plays at love with any one he meets who will let him. Our society has developed all of these characters and they need to be evoluted out of the human family. No one can be happy to be owned and watched and fretted at for every word or smile given to another; on the other hand much mischief is done by indiscriminate, off-hand love-making that comes so easy and seems such a matter of course thing to some of the advocates of social freedom. In the ordinary occupations of life no man who has to make a living or has any serious business to attend to, can possibly have time to love more than one or two women at the same time. So few people can see, as Josiah Allen's wife says, "the beauties and necessities of mejumness."

The deep grief that one feels on losing the affection of some one he loves is such a different sentiment from the fretful, suspicious, invasive complainings of the ordinary jealous person that it needs an entirely different word to express its meaning. Jealousy won't do for both. Mrs. Holmes speaks of the sorrow one will naturally feel on losing something he or she loves and values and depends upon, just as one cannot help grieving over the death of a loved one. Some of her critics seem to think she is defending narrow, petty jealousy.

Aunt Elmina believes that evolution will prove the superiority of the female, and says so in a letter in which she writes quite approvingly of my booklet "The Coming Woman." The one point in my paper, if it has a point, is the injustice and wrong of considering woman superior to man, as it is to assume man's superiority to woman. I also declare that the mother element is no more important than the father element. She can hardly endorse the "The Coming Woman" if she believes that woman is man's superior.

The man who falls headlong in love on every possible occasion, whether he thinks he is serious or is only mistaken, is somewhat to be pitied as well as despised. Despised because a man without responsibility or stability of character is despicable, and pitied because he would naturally be worried. He might be wanted to explain things and if he has a conscience he might feel bad to have the other fellow hurt, and when he makes mistakes, he must feel humiliated at finding himself such a poor reader of character, such a poor judge of personal attraction and harmony.

But your butterfly man of the world has a logical mind that saves him all worry. He reasons that the sudden cessation of letters and visits and attentions are equivalent to saying "It is all off, you are no longer attractive to me and that ends it." No one should feel badly over it for it does not hurt nearly so bad as a broken arm and a great many people have recovered from broken bones. One cannot find a sore spot caused by disappointment or wounded affection, so what is the use of worrying over such silly things or giving them a thought.

Blue-Beard might well have felicitated himself on being so kind and gentle with his wives. He cut their heads off slick and clean and surely that did not hurt nearly so much as having all their bones broken or being pitched out of the top castle window.

Your publications have done more good in my home, to make it happier, than any other reading we have had, and have brought peace, where formerly was contention. Yet I must ask you not to print this with my name, or initials, for the time of freedom is not yet. May it come soon! Thanks for extra copies.

Loretta Mann Hammond, Rosedale, Kansas:—Send "Karezza, or the Ethics of Marriage," by Dr. Alice B. Stockham $1; also the "Wedding Night," by Ida Craddock, (I don't know the price.) Also the flash'light picture of your office, and photo of yourself. We want the books for presents for New Years, if possible. Happy New Year to you and Lillian and Virna, Mrs. White and the whole outfit. Yours is about the only free paper published.

J. S. Odegaard, Ebolt, Canada:—Some years ago I read a poem entitled "The Devil Was Sitting on the Shore of Time." I cannot remember the name of the author, or the name of the journal in which I saw it. Can you or your readers tell me where it is to be found? Enclosed find a dollar to renew subscription. No. 842 has not arrived. I want to see the answer of Mr. Shepherd to Frank Reed.

H. C. Goodrich, Chicago:—Kindly send me some copies Dec. 29, issue of Lucifer. It is a splendid number. Really I never see any that are not. Some stamps enclosed. I notice you are having a great fight to make unconventional sentiments, true reform ideas, take hold of people. Never mind; the sweetest nuts are hardest to crack. The best is always slow, but sure. Those who sacrifice themselves for others' good must in the end be rewarded. It takes strong characters to withstand the onslaught of a world of ignorance. May all good be yours now at the birth of a new century.

A. W., St., Charles, Ill.:—My wife and I are getting old and we are childless. My wife would like to bring up a little boy. We have visited a good many "orphan homes" in Chicago, but there are no boys for an anarchist. The most homes ask for church references, and the end of the story is, we can't have a boy. Now, what shall I do? My wife is bound to have a boy to bring up, but will not deny her anarchistic views for the sake of obtaining one. Can you help or advise?

Frank Reed, Eureka, Calif.:—Seeing that you gave me so much of your space in the last number of Lucifer, I enclose one dollar to pay for its fifty-two visits to me, the time to be reckoned from the present date. The few cents I have already sent you, will help to pay for the little pamphlet you sent me. It is proper for me to add a few words by way of explanation: I do not feel that I am capable of sitting in judgment upon any one; but I do feel that there are some things that are done in the way of contracts and divorces that are better out of print, than in print. I believe that Mr. Shepherd had a perfect right to leave his wife, if it was perfectly agreeable to both, when he found it impossible to live with her longer and have love and respect for her. What I object to is, the precautionary measures that are resorted to in the beginning. If I had the least idea I could not always love the woman of my choice, I would not marry her. The very fact of such an arrangement would certainly cause the woman to mistrust the man, and vice versa. I would make it hard for men and women to get married, but would make it easy for them to get divorced. I would have the contracting parties go before a board of examiners, composed of phrenologists and physicians, and would have the man and woman examined as to brain development and temperament, to ascertain, if possible, whether or not the contracting parties were by nature suited to each other. The brain is as surely the organ of thought, as the piano is an organ through which notes are given off; there are too many who live in the base brain, and we shall doubtless find that a large percentage of marriage contracts are made chiefly in the base brain, and not in the intellectual faculties. The man and the woman whom nature has joined together no man can put asunder by fair means; their love for each other will endure as long as life endures, and no other one could so well satisfy that love. There are too many "mis-fits," and herein lies the great trouble. Put men and women on an easy road to earn their living—free them from fear of want, and then educate them, and we shall soon have a world of wise people and healthy children.

F. Radick, New York, City:—I am really thankful for the patience on your part in sending me Lucifer a long time after my subscription was due. Believe me, it was impossible for me until now to send you even this paltry sum of fifty cents. I am aware I am still indebted to you but still ask your forbearance till I am more able. For the last two years I have had my share of sickness and lack of work.

[The above is a fair specimen of many letters received at this office. Most of our subscribers are of the working classes—wage-working classes, and now that the dollar is magnified and exalted the worker is correspondingly debased and thrown out of employment. It now depends mainly upon human sympathy and co-operative helpfulness among those who are able to help their less fortunate brethren and sisters, whether these can continue to read Lucifer or not, or whether the paper itself can live in the twentieth century or not. M. H.]

E. E., Councilman, Newark Valley, N. Y.:—The gems of thought contained in Lucifer, the always cool and unruffled equanimity of its editor towards his critics endears it day by day to all honest thinkers and investigators. At seventy-two years of age, confined to the house during the cold winters with a maltreated broken hip, unable to earn any money for nine years, I am able to give Lucifer but little encouragement financially. The best I can do now is to send a list of names, some of which may become patrons and helpers of Lucifer.

[Having known by personal experience what it is to be confined to the house by a similar affliction I can sympathize with our appreciative friend, as few others can do. By sending us lists of names and by recommending Lucifer and the Light-Bearer Library to personal friends, Bro. Councilman can do much to help dispel the mists of superstition and ignorance in regard to the most important problems of human life. M. H.]

NEW SUBSCRIPTIONS to Lucifer and the Light-Bearer Library are coming in with gratifying rapidity. Now for a long pull a strong pull and a pull altogether, and the subscription list to each of these winged messengers will be doubled or even trebled and their influence for good correspondingly increased.

THE
British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeanne-nette Guides of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

SELF HYPNOTIC HEALING! I have made a late discovery that enables all to induce the hypnotic sleep in themselves instantly, awaken at any desired time and thereby cure all known diseases and bad habits. Anyone can induce this sleep in themselves instantly at first trial control their dreams, read the minds of friends and enemies, visit any part of the earth, solve hard questions and problems in this sleep and remember all when awake. This so-called Mental-Vision Lesson will be sent to anyone for 100 silver, actually enabling him to do the above without further charge. PROF. H. E. DUTTON, McCook, Nebraska.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents

What The Young Need to Know: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 207 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 24 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Paper covers 50 cents. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul, "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

THE EDUCATION OF THE FEMININE WILL.

BY MLLE. HARLOR.

"To be able to reason and to have pride is superfluous for one who has only to obey. . . . Reason is the liberator of conscience"—p. 7.

"Not only is it necessary to claim economic emancipation; it is necessary to preach moral emancipation at the same time and with equal fervor. It must be said that the first without the second would be three quarters barren, and that the decisive revolution is the inward revolution. . . . Resignation is the perpetual avowal of impotency."—pp. 9, 11.

A wonderfully clear and strong exposition of the demands of awakened womanhood—by a self-reliant, self-respecting woman.

Price three cents each; per dozen for distribution twenty five cents.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed?

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

A PHYSICIAN IN THE HOUSE.

A New Family Medical Work, by Dr. J. H. Greer.

This book is up-to-date in every particular.
It will save you hundreds of dollars in doctors' bills.
It tells you how to cure yourself by simple and harmless home remedies.
It recommends no poisonous or dangerous drugs.
It teaches how to save health and life by safe methods.
It teaches prevention—that it is better to know how to live and avoid disease than to take any medicine as a cure.
It is not an advertisement and has no medicine to sell.
It has hundreds of excellent recipes for the cure of the various diseases.
It has 16 colored plates, showing different parts of the human body.
The chapter on Painless Midwifery is worth its weight in gold to women.
The "Care of Children" is something every mother ought to read.
It teaches the value of Air, Sunshine, and Water as medicines.
It contains valuable information for the married.
This book cannot fail to please you. If you are looking for health by the safest and easiest means, do not delay getting it. It has eight hundred pages, is neatly bound in cloth with gold letters, and will be sent by mail or express, prepaid to any address for $2.50. Address M. Harman, 200 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo. 172 pages. Price 75 cents.

"A WOMAN in order to live the purest life, must be must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the FREE, love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially."—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD." by Henry Olerich. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 400 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy. Price $1. For sale at this office.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. IV., No. 52. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, JAN. 12, E. M. 400. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE No. 847.

To the Loser.

So you've lost your race lad?
Ran it clean and fast?
Beaten at the tape, lad?
Rough? Yes, but 'tis past.
Never mind the losing—
Think of how you ran;
Smile, and shut your teeth, lad—
Take it like a man!

Not the winning counts, lad,
But the winning fair;
Not the losing shames, lad,
But the weak despair:
n failure stuns you,
Don't forget your plan—
Smile, and shut your teeth, lad—
Take it like a man!

Diamonds turned to paste, lad?
Night instead of morn?
Where you'd pluck a rose, lad,
Oft you grasp a thorn?
Time will heal the bleeding—
Life is but a span;
Smile, and shut your teeth, lad—
Take it like a man!

Then, when sunset comes, lad,
When your fighting's through,
And the Silent Guest, lad,
Fills his cup for you,
Shrink not—clasp it coolly—
End as you began;
Smile, and close your eyes, lad—
And take it like a man!

The Woman's Portion.

Byron Boker, in "Hobart Clipper."

For a Sidney winter the night was cold beyond the common. A night of chill wind and skurrying clouds, following on the heavy and unseasonable rain of the previous day. The moon was at the full, and as it ever and anon emerged from some passing cloud-veil it made the city beautiful as only the moon can, inexplicably vitalized the atmosphere, brought out the massive buildings about the General Post Office in imposing and richly-varied chiaroscuro.

Arthur Glynfield, passing rapidly along Pitt street, noted these artistically charming maneuvers of the moonlight with distinct and generous approval, for Glynfield had the artistic temperament; he frequently told his friends so. He was a fortunate man, this Glynfield. The times of "boom," though they had impoverished thousands, had made Glynfield rich. He was singularly fortunate, with a marvelously acute premonition of a paying hazard. He had what his intimates called the "luck of the devil."

The phrase was not, perhaps, apt, for Glynfield had given largely to church and charity—had become a pillar of the state and a bulwark of the Nonconformist conscience. Even now, as he strolled erectly down Pitt street in appreciative mood, he had but just left a meeting which had enthusiastically recognized his gift of one hundred pounds to the Indian famine fund. A more than usually staunch upholder of the sanctity of marriage, a stern enemy of all sexual license, he wore on the lapel of his well-cut coat the tiny dab of white silk significant of membership of a certain "social purity league." Evidently a man of God.

"Sir!"

Mr. Glynfield was startled abruptly from his reverie, and he disliked interruptions of that sort very much at any time. But that this—this wanton should accost him, should even lay a tremulous hand on his coat, and so bring her unseemliness so near his unimpeachable respectability! He made a gesture of angry dissent, and would have passed on, but something held him.

The woman was at least thirty, and looked older. Her face, although it still bore the traces of past beauty, was deadly pale around the rouged patches, and drawn by suffering or want. The dark eyes, still beautiful, burned with the despair of a hunted animal. There was something in the pose of the emaciated figure which spoke of a time when that, too, had been beyond the usual comely.

"My God!" said the philanthropist. "You, Nell!"

"Yes," she said thickly, "it is I. And—it is like this I meet you, Arthur, after these twelve awful years! I left home, friends, womanly repute, everything for you; and I have not so much as seen you through all this hellish time. But I love you still; I love you with all the strength of my soul!"

At this point a spasm of awful coughing shook her, and the racking strength of it almost terrified him. When presently it ceased, and she stood panting, he noticed the foam on her thin lips was blood-flecked, and that the shabby dress she wore was flimsy and utterly unsuited to the night. "Nell," he said, trying to keep down all evidence of the annoyance the forlorn creature caused him, "Nell, I'm inexpressibly sorry to see you like this."

With a woman's instinct she divined his feelings, and for a moment her affronted pity of herself overcame her long passionate love of him.

"Yes," she said, laughing bitterly, "one would scarcely think that the woman you first raved over, then conquered, then forsook, only twelve years ago—the woman you and other men called beautiful—could not succeed in so much as keeping her disfigured body even by the sale of it now. Do you know, Arthur, that to-night a brute I spoke to laughed in my face, told me rag-picking was a better business for me. Think of it!"

Glynfield winced, and drew the robe of self-righteousness more closely about him.

"But," he said, "however did you come to this, Nell? I left you in London, you know; I—I never thought it possible that you could fall so far."

"Thought!" she murmured, sadly. "Of course not! Men never do think for long nor care. I don't blame you, dear. When you left me I had a little money, but it soon went, and I could not write home—I could not! Then after baby's birth—"

"Baby's! you don't mean to tell me there was a child?"

"Yes," said the woman, simply, "and I held on, longing for you, even hoping a little. But I could not get work—what could I do? And—and I could not see your child die of hunger, Arthur!"

Here another fit of that fearful coughing intervened. Then she continued in a very low tone:

"Of course things were easy enough then—easy? My God, how hard! I loved you always, Arthur, and every—every man who so much as laid a finger on me I hated because of the wrong done to you. And when baby died I thought I should go mad

But soon I got the pleurisy, and the doctor told me that nothing but a warmer climate would keep the life in me. I did not want to die till I saw you again, Arthur. Oh! I could not die till then! And I heard that you had gone to Australia, somewhere."

"But, my poor child," said Glynfield, "what can I do? I—do you know I am married, Nell?"

"No," she said with a sob of a thing sore-wounded. "But who am I that I should blame you? Only, Arthur, I know what men think and say of such as I. They cannot look at things from our standpoint. I tell you that I love you—love you as truly and purely as on the day I left my home for you. You will not say I can never see you, Arthur? It will not be for long."

"Don't you see how impossible that is," said the Philanthropist, painfully agitated. "But, Nell, I am rich now, you know. You will let me arrange that you want for nothing?"

The harlot rose to her full height. Then, with blazing eyes, as she held the poor rags about her shrunken bosom, she spoke, and the Philanthropist quailed before her:

"You offer me money—you? Then you think I have fallen low indeed! Arthur, the time will yet come when you will realize what you have done; and I would be willing to become the meanest thing that crawls sooner than exchange places with you then! I left everything for you, and you forsook me without a word. And after the horror of these years I still loved you, and forgave what there was to forgive. But now, Oh! I love you with all my heart—that is my punishment; and I hate you with all my soul!"

The fit of coughing was this time such that before it ceased the outcast had fallen to the pavement exhausted. He stooped to raise her.

Then for a second her eyes opened, and all trace of anger had gone out of them.

"Arthur," she murmured, softly, "forgive me. I love you always. It is not my punishment; it—is—my—reward!" And Glynfield shuddered in face of a new consciousness. He did not like death in the street; it was not respectable.

"Poor devil!" said the Irish constable he called. "She was moity little good, yer honor, and it's koind of yez to boide by the loikes of her."

They took her to the morgue.

So the wanton died. And the man of God went home to the arms of the pure woman.

Christmas at Home.

BY JAMES W. ADAMS.

[Chas. L. Govan, one of the workers on "Discontent," published at Home, Washington, was arrested charged with sending obscene matter through the mails. The offending article was written by Henry Addis. Mr. Govan was fined $75 and costs, which he paid. L. H.]

No stockings hung up the preceding evening; no firecrackers to celebrate the natal day of a myth; no packing of nether garments with the view of partaking of the hospitality of distant friends; no sunny smiles to greet our comrades; but with contempt for prevailing superstitions, three of us boarded the steamer Typhoon en route to Seattle where Comrade Govan was to appear next day to answer the charge of sending obscene matter through the mails. Against this charge we unequivocally and unalterably protest. The motive for writing the article, the object in publishing it, was to induce our readers to weigh well the consequences of bringing children into the world.

We returned home poorer in purse but in no wise dismayed in what we regard a violation of the Constitution of the United States. This experience has intensified our hatred of the marriage system, and man-made laws. The only salutary effect upon us is that our estimate of the officials with whom we came in contact has changed for the better. Marshals Dilly and Davidson and Commissioner —— into whose hands we were first committed were so affable that each was tendered a cordial invitation to visit us, nor was there any exhibition of austerity on the part of the United States District Attorney and Judge——

The mentality of the complainant (in this case) is so opaque or oblique that he finds not anything offensive to supersensitiveness in the nauseating details of vice and salacious advertisements found in the daily papers and second class magazines. Here are excerpts taken from the daily papers while in Seattle and on the boats——

"Elderly lady desires to form acquaintance of elderly gentleman," etc.

"Middle aged lady desires position as housekeeper for some gentleman," etc.

"Uno suppositories for anxious women, sure," etc.

"Parisian monthly regulator," etc.

"Lost manhood restored."

"Banker's wife has many beaux—Sensation suit begun."

Yet the grand jury does not find villainy and lewdness in an elderly woman advertising for a paramour in a well established daily paper—but can and does in "Dicontent"—Why? Presumably because the one is a shouter for government by force while the other stands for self-government—the only true government. No one objects to the advertisement of "Rubber Goods," "Tansy pills" &c., &c., in family newspapers; yet these advertisements refer as directly to offspring as does the matter for which a fine has been imposed. For the sake of argument we will suppose that our publication was obscene and tended to inculcate lewdness and salaciousness. What of "Rubber Goods" but that one may be indiscreet and with impunity; while the "Uno suppositories," "Tansy Pills" and the like not only plainly infer that a child may be conceived and during any stage of gestation may be aborted or in other words the parties advertise themselves as willing co-adjutors to foeticide, a common phase of murder—murder as indefensible as that of the aged or afflicted.

There is on exhibition in Seattle's most crowded thoroughfare two nickel-in-the-slot peep-shows open to young and old wherein nude figures of men and women, the posing evidently intended to excite the animal propensities. However offensive to good taste these exhibitions may be we as anarchists would not suppress them. The owners of these exhibits and their patrons have the same right to make money and gratify their curiosity as we have to gratify our propensities to better the race by publishing a paper for the purpose of helping people help themselves to think before tradition's musty shelf.

A Victim of Ignorance.

The following letter was sent to us by a physician who is in receipt of many such heart-rending stories. The writer lives in Pennsylvania. She had read a book written by the doctor and felt impelled to give him her history. The letter requires no comment by us—nothing could add to the strength of its simple truth and sincerity:

"I was an orphan, had no home; was married when thirteen to a man without a cent, without knowing one thing of what marriage meant. He was five years older than I. He thought I was his property. I was delicate, only weighing eighty-four pounds; but as I was his property I had to work in the woods with him until my first baby was born. The baby was born in the fall in a shanty where no one but a Swede family lived. I had no care, no doctor. I had scarcely anything to eat or wear, for my husband gave his money to his father. Thank God! my baby died when eleven weeks old.

"For four years I was just able to crawl around, had fainting spells all the time. Then I had another child, when my health became some better, for I then had something to love. Oh, my heart was so hungry for love! I have had nine children, but I never had one word of love from my husband. We still exist together.

"If I could have read your book years ago so I could have had some light on the subject, I could have been happy; but I thought he owned me body and soul and that I had to endure all, and that all has been more than words can express. I am thirty-nine, but I feel as though I had never really lived, but merely existed in all this misery, and I hope I never will have any more children, for I may be free. When my children get old enough to take care of themselves I will get out of jail. I was always nearly crazy when expecting a little one. I felt such a terrible aversion to him when I had to endure such terrible suffering and stand the kicks and blows and the curses heaped on me when I had done nothing to offend him except to fear him.

"My husband has a cousin whose wife was not able to turn over in bed for years. Her hip bones were drawn up until she didn't look like a human being, and still she had nine children—one every two years or less—and I never heard of his ever speaking a kind word to that poor woman.

"Is there anything in this world needed more than something to prevent children being born of such parents?"

Progressive Views by a Clergyman

From a sermon by the Rev. L. M. Powers, Buffalo, N. Y.

Of all the foolish things ministers do there are few more foolish than preaching of the advantages of early marriage and against childless homes and divorce. These are almost entirely the results of economic conditions. Unperverted human nature is all right, or if it is not, preaching can never change it; but the economic conditions of today are wrong and they can be changed.

I recognize the fact that the smallest families are usually found among people of largest means, but this requires no modification of the statement that economic conditions are at the bottom of most of the disturbing elements in the home. Idle luxury on the one hand works as much mischief to the home as degrading poverty on the other. Change the economic conditions, give to the men who earn that which they produce, compel those who divide up their time betwixt sleeping and singing to go to work, and most of the hindrances to happy home life will disappear.

One cause which has a tendency to lessen marriage is good. Not long ago every woman had to marry to live. Today there are in this country over four millions of women earning their own living. Marrying for a shelter and a home is going out of fashion. More and more as woman achieves her economic independence, will marriage be a matter of choice on her part, and this both for herself and the race will be an unqualified gain.

There is another accompaniment to marriage that strikes the outsider unfavorably. It is the unwritten law which seems to decree that all former friendships must cease at marriage. Even though the couple themselves have sense, they are seldom strong enough to ignore the world's base suspicions. Marriage must mean larger liberty, greater confidence and trust, a fuller recognition of the fact that the spiritual needs of live souls cannot be found in the eternal gossip of two over the tea table, in a word the association should enlarge instead of narrow one's life and sympathies. The selfish, jealous spirit which many men and women exhibit on assuming the married relationship helps to produce the restlessness that results in the divorce court.

Women Adopt a Masculine Garment.

"Current News."

While we are upon the subject of clothing, may I very lightly touch upon the astonishing news that tens and hundreds of thousands of English women have permanently adopted the garment which, up till perhaps a year ago, was man's distinguishing garb? Manhood's last bulwark has been stormed and taken, I am most credibly informed, and today that grotesque question which a much advertising clothier used to print and distribute among New York men and women alike would at last be answered in the affirmative. Do you remember the question? It was, "Do you wear pants?" It seems that this bifurcated garment which we used to think had a gender of its own was surreptitiously, and most modestly, stolen from the sterner sex, to be hidden beneath the shortened skirt of those of the fair moiety of mankind who lightly pursued the flying front wheel of the bicycle. Alas for us and our once proud possession, it seems that the garment has stayed where it was put, shortened to the knees as it is and buckled there, but made of manly cloths and corduroys, as it was when the predatory sex filched it from us. Thus go practically all young school girls, I am told, most of the millions of young, unmarried ladies and practically all ladies of whatever age and condition who either lead or follow the smartest fashion. Ah, me! it was a delicate subject which the stern duty of a chronicler thus forced upon my pen, and I thank the kindly gods that they have enabled me to dash through it and away without a single false step or cause for regret.

[There should be no man-made laws to prescribe the kind of garb that any human being must wear; unless it be the prison-stripes of convicts and felons. Enforced garb means tyranny, every time. Were men and women clad alike, sex would be evident, to the informed observer—all others should ask if in doubt, or else remain uninformed.—H. V. W.]

Where is Freedom Free, or Equality Equal?

BY FLORA W. FOX.

Please allow me to call your attention to a booklet just issued by that clear, independent thinker, Dr. Orr W. Lee of Des Moines, Iowa: "Where is Freedom Free, or Equality Equal, in the Social Evil or in Marriage?" I glean a few sentences.

"Humanity must analyze the social evil before it can be suppressed. If people would study natural laws instead of man-made statutes, they would come to conclusions that would bring freedom from superstition and dogmas, the ignorance that darkened the world. Statutes regarding woman's relationship with the body-politic, or as to her association with men, are all man-made. No enactments come from women as a body, or reveal the presence, counsel or consideration of her wishes, save as they harmonize with established interests, profits and lusts of morality. This being the case, it is but just that men take the responsibilities that fall, as chips from their graven handiwork.

"Speaking of the cruel term 'bastard.'

"Man's own legislation has proven him to be a coward that dares not father or brother his own issue.

"The regeneration of man's economic condition is the surest way to save our women and girls, our men and boys.

"Nature regulates weddings; man has regulated marriages. 'Wedded' expresses the condition where the woman fills her equal and half-place in the whole union.

"Marriages have been carried on similar to the sales at a market place. If the contracting parties fight over their private relationship it is well and good (marriage is a success) but rather mystifying to onlookers!

"The present marriage system is not productive of either health, comfort or happiness. The condition will be changed by a great many individuals for themselves, long before society will adopt any modification of its tenets.

"Revolutionists in sexual matters, as in the overthrowing of false governments, defy society's edicts, customs and statutes. This has made martyrs, whose bodies have been forced to endure the agonizing loneliness and torture of jails and dungeons."

At the close Dr. Lee gives the form of a wedding contract, used by himself and wife I believe. It is a comprehensive, just, sensible, but an alarmingly liberal statement of what true co-operation means, with "no fears to entertain; no pledges to exact; no commands to give; no powers to serve; nothing to question or decide." Who could hesitate to wed under these simple restrictions? Ah! but who of us could continuously comply with even these?

No one but a coward is afraid to learn of truth, and to appropriate all that is wisest and best of her teachings.

Americans Helping to Conquer The Boers.

A little more than a century ago the sovereign of a small German principality covered his name with lasting if not everlasting infamy by selling his human chattels or serfs to the British monarch to be driven unwillingly to battle against their fellow human beings, the American colonists, then fighting for their homes and political independence.

Ever since that time the word "Hessian" has been a term of reproach, of detestation, if not of execration in the minds of the American people.

What are the descendants of these same American colonists doing today, in a war similar in many respects to that of "1776?"

A kinswoman of George the Third, guided and controlled by a successor to Lord North, as prime minister, is now putting forth greater efforts, by far, to crush the Dutch colonists in South Africa than did her egotistic and half-idiotic grand-uncle, to crush the American revolutionists of a century or more ago. After more than a year of fearful suffering and slaughter—after the death or disabling of more than seventy thousand men of the invading armies and the loss of a far greater number of horses, the comparative handful of Dutch burghers are still unconquered, and still the cry goes forth for more men and especially for more horses, to fill the depleted ranks of the imperialistic invaders.

Owing to the industrial war ever waging and never settled among their wage slaves—brought about mainly by capitalistic monopoly of the means of subsistence, the British imperialists find little difficulty in buying the bodies and mechanical service of men—biped recruits, for their wasted armies, in the labor markets of their own dominions, but for horses—four-footed recruits, it is not so easy.

Here then, seems the main trouble. An army of biped troops, no matter how large or how well equipped, is comparatively helpless when landed on South African shores. Cavalry—meaning HORSE-men—HIPPO-CENTAURS, is by far the most effective division or arm of the invading force. "My kingdom for a horse"! was once the despairing cry of one of Victoria's predecessors, when unhorsed on the battle-field, and if the supply of horses should fail the present British sovereign, she would certainly fail to add the two South African republics to her imperial domain.

The loss of four-footed soldiers in the English-African armies seems to have been something quite unprecedented in the annals of modern warfare, and now, having drained the empire, presumably, of its best material for this purpose the English recruiting agents are at work on American soil. One of these agents is reported to have shipped, from Kansas City alone, fifty thousand horses and mules to Cape Town and other English South African ports. "Only the best animals are accepted," says the report. The cost per head to the British quarter-masters in Africa is stated to be about three hundred and sixty dollars, after deducting the loss in transit, which must be something fearful—crowded closely together, with scarcely standing room, on cars and ocean-going transports, about forty days being required for the trip.

Think for a single moment, what must be the sufferings of these noble beasts, taken as they are from the salubrious air and water, and from comparative freedom of a Kansas or Missouri stock-range, to be crowded together by the hundred in the stifling air of the hold of the ship, for a solid month or six weeks, under the burning suns of the tropical passage!

We have all had our feelings harrowed by recitals of the "horrors of the Middle Passage," on board the slave-ships, before the abolition of the African slave trade. Is there no Wilberforce or Clarkson, no Harriet Beecher Stowe, to lift a voice in protest against this trade in horses taken to be slaughtered on South African battle-fields?

"War is hell,"—for man and beast alike,—said one who knew whereof he spoke, but it seems even more pitiful for our poor voiceless relative, the horse, than even for the human soldier who can raise his voice in protest when abused.

Bad as our economic conditions are the man who chooses the slavery of the military life instead of slavery to industrial bosses, has some choice, some voice in the matter. He knows what war means; the horse does not. After enlisting the man has still a few rights and privileges left, and when sick or wounded, there are surgeons and hospitals, nurses and ambulances for him, but none for his brother soldier, the horse. The enlistment paper of the horse is the bill of sale from the breeder to the army officer, and so terribly severe is the strain upon his powers of endurance that six weeks is said to be the average span of life of the cavalry horse after reaching South Africa.

The humanitarian view of the matter, however, was not uppermost in mind when I began this article. It was rather the question of responsibility to ourselves and to the race at large, for the part we are now taking in the conquest of the Boer republics by imperial Britain. I was thinking that if the English recruiting agent at Kansas City should enlist fifty thousand men, American farmers and stockmen, to go and fight as foot soldiers for the British empress, these farmers and stockmen would do the Boer cause much less harm than they do now by sending fifty thousand of their best horses as remounts for the horseless cavalrymen already on the ground, and that if the Boers are finally conquered it will be largely owing to the act of these American Hessians—the men who sell their quadruped chattels to the English monarch to help her subdue those she now regards as rebels against her authority. The Landgrave of Hesse probably knew little and cared less of and for the merits of the war in America, but he had more human chattels than he had money to spend on his court equipages, or his royal vices, and so he exchanged some thousands of the said chattels for ready cash.

Likewise, the Kansas and Missouri farmers know little and presumably careless of the merits of the British-Boer war, but they want money to pay their mortgages and to buy more land to raise more horses, steers and hogs, and so they are very willing, for the sake of a better price than the home market affords, to send their best dumb chattels to help the British subjugate the Boers.

I have credited the American horse-breeders with ignorance of the merits of the South African war. I claim the same for myself, and now—in conclusion—would say, in few words, that while I have little or no sympathy for and with the Boers in many of their beliefs, customs and practices—their faith in the Jehovah god of Abraham, of Moses and Joshua, of Samuel and David; their patterning after these old patriarchs in their treatment of the Kaffirs and other African tribes, etc.; and while I have little sympathy with their miscalled republican form of government, nevertheless and notwithstanding this lack of sympathy I am free to say that, with my present stock of information as to the merits of the war, if the British still persist in refusing to submit the matters in dispute to a board of arbitration I feel much inclined to paraphrase and adopt the language of a noted Englishman during the American war for independence, when he said—in substance:

"Were I a Boer [born and bred] as I am an American, while a foreign foe remained in my country, I never would lay down my arms,—never, never, NEVER!" M. H.

Books Worth Reading.

"Herbert Spencer and his Critics," by Charles B. Waite, A. M., author of "History of the Christian Religion to the year 200," "A Conspiracy Against the Republic," etc. Chicago, 1900; C. F. Waite & Co., publishers.

From the first chapter of this book of 184 pages, under the head "The New Philosophy—Doctrine of the Unknowable" we quote a paragraph or two:

"No writer of the Nineteenth Century has had greater influence in the world of thought than Herbert Spencer. At the same time no one has been more severely and unsparingly criticised.

"These criticisms, with his replies, have exhibited an intellectual gladiatorship such as has seldom been witnessed; one which has had the effect to arouse discussion and to stimulate thought and inquiry all along the lines of his philosophy. His works are now complete. The labors of a life-time have been brought to a close."

Both as a scientist and philosopher Herbert Spencer stands head and shoulders above his contemporaries, with the possible exception of Huxley and Darwin. I now speak only of his English and American contemporaries. Most of our readers have neither the means to buy nor the time to read the voluminous works of the great leader in the world of thought, and hence will be glad of the opportunity afforded by this book of convenient size, to get a clear and concise statement of the "New Philosophy," sometimes called the "Spencerian Philosophy," by one fully competent to perform this very difficult task, and also to see what Spencer's principal opponents and critics have to say.

The book is remarkably well printed and bound. Price not given, but is probably one dollar. It can be ordered through this office.

"THE WHITE FLAME."

In Lucifer number 837 there appeared a brief notice of a book by this name, with a promise to give quotations from and a brief analysis of the same later on. That promise I will now try to fulfill.

In the early history of Modern Spiritualism in this country it was by no means uncommon to hear of people being confined in asylums because of their belief in what is called spirit return. Now that this philosophy—or delusion, as my reader may choose to call it, has become comparatively popular and numbers its adherents by the million, we seldom hear of people being adjudged insane because they claim to hold daily and nightly converse with friends who no longer wear the "garment of flesh."

The heroine of the story called "The White Flame" was not called a Spiritualist by herself or others but the book opens with the sentence, "Some one was sitting in my chair," which "some one" was visible and audible to no one but the owner of the chair; and because she talked nightly with what was to her a real personage, though invisible and inaudible to all her friends, the said heroine, named "Frank" for short, was sent to a sanitarium, or private asylum. From this asylum she escaped, and donning male attire went to Europe as a teacher of music in the family of a rich man, a distinguished judge named Bennett, who in course of time becomes her husband.

Such is the merest skeleton of the story and may sound commonplace enough to the average story-reader, but "The White Flame" is no commonplace story. Though not avowedly an iconoclast of the old and a builder of the new the writer of the book shows clearly enough that she has caught gleams of what the future has in store for the race when when woman shall break the chains that in all the past have made her a slave to conventionalism, to church-state codes of morality, of purity, of virtue, of goodness.

A few brief quotations will help to explain what is here outlined. Describing her sensations when first dressed as a boy she says:

"I walked a long time for the pleasure it gave me. The lightness of my apparel was a source of strength. With no skirts to weigh me down I felt light enough to fly. I looked with pity on every woman I met switching her skirts around her ankles. Does a man's dress engender in him a sense of superiority over the less favored petticoat-weakened part of humanity?"

When advised by a friend to continue her male attire, and study and practice law as a man, she said:

"I wish I might, for I shall forever after this abominate the tiresome swing of a skirt. I have grown strong and vigorous in this dress and I like it; if I were to set the fashion for woman I would give her a short skirt that would not burden her."

To please her friends Frank returned to the conventional costume for women, but her protest against woman's slavery to trailing skirts is a prophecy of what is coming when the swaddling clothes of theologic superstition are fully outgrown. That this change is coming is voiced also by what our author puts into the mouth of one of her characters, Miss Gay, the architect, or designer of a new church. Frank was urging her to speak to the pastor about the right of women to live a larger life, and this is part of her answer:

"Were I to say to him, if thou circumscribe woman's attainments thou wilt cheat thine own sex, for there can be no perfection in the race until we have a line of educated and untrammeled mothers, what would be his reply? 'Let the women keep silent in the churches.'"

Adding that the pastor would thus "tie the tongue of oratory, and deprive her sons of the prenatal culture which the mother transmits to her offspring."

Among other pointers showing that the author is not tied to conventional ideas in regard to love is the fact that her heroine ardently loves two men at the same time. Speaking of her pastor, Gabriel Booth, Frank says:

"I loved him devotedly, not as I loved Judge Bennett, in whose arms I ardently longed to be, but as one possessing more than human perfection, and whose good opinion I coveted more than anything else. Judge Bennett was connected in my mind with the things of earth: Gabriel Booth with the things of heaven. Could both men have been made into one, to have been wedded to that one would at that time, have satisfied every desire of my soul."

This is quite similar to the central thought of the pamphlet entitled "Motherhood in Freedom," namely, that to do her best work in creating new human beings woman needs the physical, the intellectual and the psychic co-operation of more than one man; in other words that several men would have to be rolled into one in order to satisfy the needs and aspirations of the evoluted woman.

Though for a time the woman of the future may clothe one man with all the attributes that her mind, her soul or her physical needs require, she will soon find that her idol is but human after all, and like the image that Daniel saw, her perfect man is pure gold only in part, the rest being baser metals, grading down to common clay.

Frank's words, "at that time," are suggestive of the possibility that later on even these two much loved and admired men would not satisfy the aspirations of her progressive mind and soul.

Finally, then, I would say that the "White Flame" is a book of the Transition from the old to the new; that it introduces the new by suggestion, rather than by direct inculcation or clear-cut formulation. Its central thought and motto, "The White Flame of Mercy Never Dies" eliminates and denies the doctrine of hate, of hell, of endless pain for any human being; the doctrine that, more than any other, has filled the world with war, with wretchedness and woe.

By suggestion the author teaches self-reliance, self-help, for woman as well as man, instead of reliance on the "atoning blood," or on authority of a priest or a book, and while her book will not fully satisfy Lucifer's most radical readers I can heartily recommend it as useful and helpful, especially to those who still cling to the old ideals of woman's subordination to man, and to the exclusive and life-long love of one woman for one man and one man for one woman.

In a very charming way the book weaves and blends the occult, the psychic, the telepathic, the spiritualistic, with the commonplace, the every day affairs of life, and, as said before, I found it very helpful reading as a restful diversion when both mind and body needed relaxation and repair.

Training a Child.

One of the illustrated pages of the "New York Evening Journal" of December 15, was largely taken up with letters of protest against the avowed intention of a young mother to bring up her baby girl without hearing anything of gods, devils, heavens, hells, and other ecclesiastical teachings. Believing that Lucifer's readers would like to hear what these critics have to say we quote the editorial introduction and some of the letters:

A little girl of Cincinnati whose wondering eyes have as yet looked upon but two weeks of the world is to be reared in the strictest school of agnosticism.

She is to know nothing of prayer or of praise, as Christian teaching regards them. She is to be brought up without ever learning a prayer at her mother's knee, without a love or a fear in her heart for the Divine One.

These are facts, corroborated by a statement by her mother, who is nineteen years old and an agnostic. The baby's father, too, is an agnostic, and in the influences in which they believe the little one is to be reared.

CRY OF PROTEST FROM CHRISTIANS.

The announcement that the parents of the baby girl intended to bring up their child beyond the pale of Christianity has aroused a cry of protest from Christians throughout this country. Criticism has gone with the protest, and many persons have communicated with the "Evening Journal," condemning the course of the parents of this little one.

The little girl is Charlotte Ingersoll Sparks, the child of Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Sparks. The father is an attorney in Cincinnati, and both he and his wife are agnostics.

Mrs. R. S. McLeod says:

"To raise a child without prayers or religious influences is not only bad for the child, but bad for the community. Such a child is a menace.

"Immorality spreads with the disbelief of God and anarchy threatens. A child so raised is a child ruined and made the essence of selfishness."

"Mrs. McCune makes an earnest plea to teach the child to pray, if not, 'teach her the Golden Rule, which includes all the great truths that Christ came to teach.' She appeals to Mrs. Sparks to leave the child alone rather than follow the plan laid out, 'for religion,' she says 'is innate in the human heart and the child will learn to acknowledge God.'

"Delia Phelan, of No 101 Tilliary street, who takes a keen interest in the affairs for children in St. James's Cathedral, Brooklyn, in a letter which is to be sent to Mrs. Sparks, says:

"'I cannot understand how any woman who is a mother can bring up a child and make it not believe in God and prayer It is a shame to allow this to be done.

"'Can nothing prevent it? If a generation of girls are brought up without religion and prayer, God pity the human race.'"

"Mrs. James McCormick, of No. 226 Pearl street, known in the Catholic religious circles of Brooklyn, in a written statement which she has asked to be sent to Mr. and Mrs. Sparks in Cincinnati says:

"'If a little baby girl is not taught to pray, her young girlhood will be blighted. If not taught the love and fear of God she will be far more apt to go wrong. If you don't commence to teach the child it will be of no avail afterward.'"

Among the letters that have been sent to Mrs. Sparks is one from Miss G. Byrne, No. 37 West Ninety-ninth street, New York City:

To Mrs. Charles Sparks:—A child who is brought up without religious training loses the sweetest of early influences. The man who has established a philosophy of life may remain a creditable citizen without the restraining influences of religion, but children must be taught the gospel of love before they are taught the gospel of reason.

I feel truly sorry for the little girl who is never to know the comfort of prayer. But there is consolation in the thought of human contrariety. Little Charlotte Ingersoll Sparks, if she is a normal little girl, will naturally want to investigate that from which she has been so zealously guarded. I foresee that nothing short of ritual will satisfy her. G. BYRNE.

Some of us who had the misfortune to be brought up under the "religious influences" here spoken of as so necessary to the moral health of the child, remember well the effect thereof on our tender minds and consciences—until by frequent presentation the picture lost much of its horror by repetition. Familiarity hardens and sears the mind to the most shocking sights or teachings. The French women used to take their children and their knitting and sit by the hour to witness the work of the guillotine, without being in the least horrified at the sight, so common had it become.

For one I shall never forget the effect on my infant mind when first told by my father the meaning of these terrible words "devil and hell." He was himself a devout believer in the literal interpretation of these Bible teachings, and being a very kind and tender-hearted man was often himself on the verge of insanity because of his realistic belief in these truly devilish doctrines. Naturally courageous in the face of real danger I could scarcely sleep at night because of these goblin Bible stories and for years and years would waken in a terrible fright from dreaming of seeing the devil and being thrown by him into the flames of hell. That this fear had any salutary restraining effect upon my conduct I certainly do not believe, but instead, the tendency was to make me doubt be justice if not the truth of the whole Bible scheme of morals, and, in fact every standard or code of morals.

I certainly congratulate Charlotte Ingersoll Sparks on the prospect that her young mind will not be warped by the teachings of a crude, irrational and vicious system of morals and religion, and yet I think her parents make a serious mistake when they make an attempt to keep all knowledge of theologic teachings from their child. Far better, as I think it would be to let her go to Sunday school and church occasionally, while yet under parental guardianship,—while her parents are near to apply the needed antidote. M. H.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hit-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Guiders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

SELF HYPNOTIC HEALING! I have made a late discovery that enables all to induce the hypnotic sleep in themselves instantly, awaken at any desired time and thereby cure all known diseases and bad habits. Anyone can induce this sleep in themselves instantly at first trial, control their dreams, read the minds of friends and enemies, visit any part of the earth, solve hard questions and problems in this sleep and remember all when awake. This so-called Mental-Vision Lesson will be sent to anyone for 10c silver, actually enabling him to do the above without further charge. PROF. E. E. DUTTON, McCook, Nebraska.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents

What The Young Need to Know: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers; 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Paper covers 50 cents. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul, "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

THE EDUCATION OF THE FEMININE WILL.

BY MLLE. HARLOR.

"To be able to reason and to have pride is superfluous for one who has only to obey. . . . Reason is the liberator of conscience"—p. 7.

"Not only is it necessary to claim economic emancipation; it is necessary to preach moral emancipation at the same time and with equal fervor. It must be said that the first without the second would be three-quarters barren, and that the decisive revolution is the inward revolution. . . . Resignation the perpetual avowal of impotency."—pp. 9, 11.

A wonderfully clear and strong exposition of the demands of awakened womanhood—by a self-reliant, self-respecting woman.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do no all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed?

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., NO. 1. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, JAN. 12, E. M. 400. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE NO. 848.

If I Were a Voice.

If I were a Voice—a persuasive Voice—
That could travel the wide world through,
I would fly on the beams of the morning light,
And speak to men with a gentle might,
And tell them to be true.
I'd fly, I'd fly, o'er land and sea,
Wherever a human heart might be,
Telling a tale or singing a song,
In praise of the Right—in blame of the Wrong.

If I were a Voice—a consoling Voice—
I'd fly on the wings of air;
The homes of Sorrow and Guilt I'd seek,
And calm and truthful words I'd speak,
To save them from Despair.
I'd fly, I'd fly, o'er the crowded town,
And drop, like the happy sunlight, down
Into the hearts of suffering men,
And teach them to rejoice again.

If I were a Voice—a controlling Voice—
I'd travel with the wind;
And, whenever I saw the nations torn
By warfare, jealousy, or scorn,
Or hatred of their kind,
I'd fly, I'd fly, on the thunder-crash,
And into their blinded bosom flash;
And, all their evil thoughts subdued,
I'd teach them Human Brotherhood.

If I were a Voice—a pervading Voice—
I'd seek the kings of earth;
I'd find them alone on their beds at night,
And whisper words that should guide them right—
Lessons of priceless worth.
I'd fly more swift than the swiftest bird,
And tell them things they never heard—
Truths which the ages for aye repeat,
Unknown to the statesmen at their feet.

If I were a Voice—an immortal Voice—
I'd speak in the people's ear;
And, whenever they shouted "Liberty,"
Without deserving to be free,
I'd make their error clear,
I'd fly, I'd fly, on the wings of day,
Rebuking wrong on my world-wide way,
And making all the world rejoice—
If I were a Voice—an immortal Voice.

—Charles Mackay.

Women, Beauty and Love.

Bertha Marvin in "Liberty."

For the saying that "a man is as old as he feels, but a woman is as old as she looks," there is, perhaps, a more profound raison d' etre than one's first feeling discovers. It may be accepted as a pleasantry designed to certify that the world has no use for a woman who doesn't "look right"; but it is doubtful whether it would ever have come to be a saying at all if woman had not always been a step farther from conscious, deliberate egoism than man. The world has a place for a man, however he looks,—work for him, a sphere for him, and respectful attention to him because he fills that sphere. Isn't it usually the first question asked about a woman: "Is she good-looking?" Mrs. Whitney has a character who was never called pretty, as a child, but of her as a woman they said: "Desire was just beautiful—she never stopped to be pretty." Women usually stop to be pretty—if they can. They lose time, stopping. And they may fail,—are sure to fail at last,—for no beauty that can be stopped for endures to the end, if the end be long delayed. If women were once to betake themselves to realizing life—feeling it—with less care about their external presentment—and let themselves look to the world as they chanced to,—would they not, perhaps, come to have that part in life which belongs to those who take part in it,—to the actors on the stage, not the decollete audience in the boxes who are there to be focussed with the opera-glasses.

The practical attitude of many men and women of new thought toward love seems at variance with the theoretical attitude. It is as if they let themselves love under protest, and approve themselves most when they love least. I say "least," because I am thinking of the line: "To divide is not to take away"—the line to which we are all saying 'Amen" with our tongues and presumably with our hearts. Do you say: "It is not to add, either perhaps"? It is quite true that love is neither more nor less than because one loves one, or two, or three, or five people. The force of a heart's outgoing is not measured by numbers. But exactly in proportion as you give your love-nature its fling, as if it were an honorable part of your being, you do thereby increase your capacity for loving. Whenever you deliberately refrain from loving anyone whom you find yourself spontaneously drawing near, you do thereby and verily contract your heart. Do not think that there can be a transmutation of the love you might have for the new friend to the friend you call your lover. The passional force of your true nature will enrich all lives, all loves, if you give your heart its way. But it will only shrivel your whole being if you deny its righteousness. And then the dishonesty of this attitude of suppression. You are with your lover, and your thoughts are with another. And you will not let yourself go to this other waiting heart, and say: "I think of you and I love you." Instead, you keep quietly within those encircling arms, saying always to yourself—not aloud—the same refrain: "It is you I wish to love. I love you, and you I wish to love." Vera Pavlovna was honest, and said it aloud. Had she been silent, Lopoukhoff's words must needs have been long delayed: "Remember, my friend, what you said to me on the day of our betrothal: 'You give me liberty.'" And, however great may be your doubt if there be, perchance, Lopoukhoffs in real life, at least command your heart to be honest with itself. But I don't know just how I came into all this. When I began, I was thinking only how easy it was to backslide—how easy it was to get into a rut in loving, just as one does in all the ways and walks of life—how very easy it might sometimes be to mistake the finding ourselves in touch with one to whom we are accustomed, for the height and depth of all possible love. Always we are afraid—again afraid—the new heart may fail us—the new love is untried. As if we were not more—if we let ourselves be—than anything that can fail us! Love need not be only adjustability—the smooth flow of the great river to the ocean. To those profound and open natures that make room for honest and full expression of every elemental force within them, a single human life becomes as wide-reaching, as limitless, as the ocean.

The Nineteenth Century.

BY R. B. KERR.

The Nineteenth Century will be remembered mainly for two things. First, the extraordinary advances which were made in the physical and natural sciences, both in theory and in the application of theory to practical uses. It will be remembered as the century in which the old stage coach was superseded by the railway train, the horse by the bicycle, the wooden sailing vessel by the ocean liner, and the slow and expensive mail-service of a hundred years ago by the electric telegraph and telephone.

But the nineteenth century will be remembered also for its humanitarianism and the wonderful uplifting of the weak by which it was characterized. The position of the masses of men, and of the whole population of women, children, and domestic animals, changed so completely during the century that it is difficult to realize the facts even when the proof of them is indisputable.

A hundred years ago serfdom prevailed over about three-fourths of Continental Europe, and traces of it lingered even in the mining laws of Scotland. Today it has been entirely swept away.

Just about the beginning of the nineteenth century the burning question in the British Isles was that of Negro slavery in the colonies. Men like Clarkson, Wilberforce, and William Pitt were agitating this question, in the teeth of tremendous opposition, while it had not yet come to be discussed at all in any other country. Finally in 1833 the British Parliament abolished slavery throughout all the British possessions, paying the slave-owners $100,000,000 as compensation, a proceeding which the historian Lecky has justly described as one of the "three or four perfectly virtuous acts recorded in the history of nations." Since then all civilized nations of any importance have pursued a similar course, so that slavery may be considered a thing of the past.

A hundred years ago the United States was the only country, of any account at least, in which the great masses of the people had any share whatever in the election of the government. Now nearly every country which professes Christianity has manhood suffrage, and several also give a vote to every woman.

A hundred years ago England was the only country in which the modern factory system had taken root. In the textile industries the work was mainly done by pauper children of six and seven years old, who worked sixteen hours a day, while overseers with whips walked up and down, and laid about them to make the children work harder. After a little while Parliament stopped the workhouse children being so treated, but their places were taken by other children who worked hard all day, to earn bread for their parents who remained idle at home. A certain number of women were also able to find work, while their husbands stayed at home to cook and mind the baby. Then came the great crusade of Shaftsbury and his friends, which resulted in the Ten Hours' Act and the other Factory Acts, and in the abolition of the labor of young children. These Acts have been enforced with great strictness, and not only have many other countries passed similar laws, but some have gone far further. A few countries, like New Zealand, Australia, British Columbia, and Utah have reduced the hours of labor to eight, to some or all of the population.

Few things have done as much for mankind as Trades Unionism, an institution of the nineteenth century. In all countries which are old enough to have any industrial history wages enormously increased during the century in organized trades, but the wages of unorganized labor increased very little.

A hundred years ago the over-whelming majority of the people in nearly all countries were unable to read and write. Justin McCarthy tells us that before the Education Act of 1870 more than two-thirds of the children of England never had any education at all. England was an unusually bad case, but as much might have been said of most nations fifty years before. At the present time an illiterate person is a rare exception in most Christian countries.

In 1800 two hundred crimes were punishable with death in England, and other countries were in the same predicament. Now the criminal law, instead of being too rigorous, is in many matters a good deal too mild.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century the press had very little freedom in any country. Even in the latter half of the century editors were sent to prison for ten or twelve years in the Southern States for advocating the abolition of slavery. Outside of Russia such things are inconceivable in our time. In Western Europe and all English-speaking countries there are very few restrictions on the press, and the penalties imposed would have seemed utterly trivial to our ancestors.

During the century marvelous strides were made in sanitation and the extermination of disease. Scourges like cholera, small-pox, and the plague, the frequent and deadly visitors of former ages, scarcely come at all in our time, and when they come they do very little harm.

The position of women improved greatly during the nineteenth century. A hundred years ago they had practically no rights of property anywhere, while in our time they have in most progressive countries equal property rights with men. In England, and the colonies which have adopted the law of England, a husband has no longer any right to the custody of his wife's person. As the Master of the Rolls said in the Clitheroe case, "under the law of England a man has no more rights over the personal liberty of his wife than over that of any other woman."

The social freedom of women also increased very much during the nineteenth century, at least among the classes which set the fashion to the whole community. It is no longer considered degrading for a woman to work, nor is it considered waste of money to educate her. Girls now go everywhere without a chaperon, and even the daughters of the Prince of Wales bicycle about the country by themselves.

Children also have a much better time of it than they used to have. A hundred years ago even the schools of the gentry were houses of correction and starvation. Dotheboys Hall is now a thing of the past, and as much may be said of the workhouses described in "Oliver Twist." In domestic life, too, children receive infinitely more consideration than they used to do.

The welfare of the lower animals has received far more attention in the nineteenth century than in any former age. These creatures are now coming to be regarded as an important part of the body politic, as sensitive to pain and pleasure as their human brothers and sisters, and every whit as deserving of social consideration. Darwin has greatly aided the humane tendencies of the age by proving that the ape, the dog, and the horse are our own relations, although more distant than the negro slave. The interest of the century in the lower animals was shown by its associations for the prevention of cruelty to animals, and its movement against vivisection and the practice of eating animal food. Some of these movements have displayed a zeal not altogether according to knowledge, but, it is safe to predict that the protection of animals on thoroughly scientific lines will be one of the great achievements of the new century.

Towards the end of the century the experiments made throughout the world in national and municipal socialism greatly benefitted the human race. New Zealand entirely abolished the great evil of strikes and lockouts by a system of compulsory arbitration. She also introduced old age pensions, which has given absolute satisfaction. Glasgow began to supply good houses to the poor at low rents, and erected lodging houses in which a single man can get bed-room, bath, and reading matter for seven cents a night, together with a fire to cook his food at. If he prefers it, he can get his cookery done for a trifle. Some French municipalities supply free bread. The success of Glasgow and many other cities in running street railways, and supplying water, gas, and electric light, is too well known to need comment. The British Government nationalized the telegraphs, and almost immediately cut the price of telegrams in two. With regard to railways in Switzerland I learn from the "Appeal to Reason" that "about two years ago the Government bought the entire railroad system of the nation and proceeded to show what it could do. After increasing the wages, reducing the hours of employees, and reducing the tariff to one-third of its former rate on both freight and passengers, its officials were not satisfied and put in a system of season tickets by buying one of which for $16 you can ride on any railroad in the nation as often as you please, as long as you please, and at any time within its limits that you please." . . . . . The Government of Switzerland receives enough returns to pay the interest on $100,000 a mile which it paid for the railroads, and is laying by a sinking fund that will wipe out the debt in fifty years.

Finally, there were fewer wars in the nineteenth century than in any preceding age recorded in history. Alexander Sutherland, in his remarkable essay on "The Natural Decline of Warfare," which can be obtained in the Tucker Library, has shown that for twelve hundred years at least wars have been ever less frequent from age to age. War was once a part of the normal business of every able-bodied man. Now, not one man in a hundred ever sees it. "In the eleventh century," says Gibbon, "every peasant was a soldier, and every village a fortification; each wood and valley was the scene of murder and rapine." In the nineteenth century there was no war between any two great powers from 1815 to 1854, or from 1871 to the end of the century. History records at least two great humanitarian movements against war. One was the Truce of God in the eleventh century, the object of which was to make every boy swear before the altar at the age of twelve that he would leave off fighting every Wednesday night, and not begin again until the Monday morning. The other was the Peace Conference called by the Czar of Russia to put an end to war altogether.

Such was the nineteenth century.—There is little doubt that the twentieth century will witness changes many times more beneficent than the nineteenth.

Revising Our Opinions.

BY LIZZIE M. HOLMES.

A great many radical thinkers are beginning to "call in their opinions and look them over," as Myron Reed once said. The first crude conceptions of personal liberty, adopted by many sincere and many truth-loving people as a basis of principles and conduct, are proving imperfect and unsatisfactory. The best happiness to self and the most good to others, are not always the result of following the conclusions arrived at a good many years ago.

The modern free love idea gained a footing among the thinkers of this country about fifty years since. It has been lived, advocated, defended and taught by some of the brightest minds and strongest characters among them. The good accomplished by these earnest people in loosening the bonds which enslaved the "old woman" can scarcely be estimated. And wherever the idea of individual liberty has been thoroughly understood, it has truly elevated and enriched the character. But the theory has been misunderstood by many of its converts as well as by its enemies. When Epicurius taught his disciples in Athens, he was despised and maligned by his enemies as a teacher of vice of all kinds, because he taught that happiness was the object of life. They could not imagine that one could make happiness an aim unless he plunged into all sorts of selfish, sensual pleasures; naturally this man and his disciples, having no fear of the angry gods before their eyes, must be indulging in the rankest of sins.

Theon, a youth of much learning and virtue, expected to find them rioting in the worst of dissipations, their minds corrupted and their bodies diseased. Instead, he discovered them to be cheerful, healthful, strong, wise, and simple in their tastes, loving learning, living closely to Nature whom they adored. Their object in life was happiness—but they had learned the best way to find it.

The thought of a free life often comes very suddenly to individuals. Divested of the fear of an angry God, of hell, of penalties which an outraged society would inflict, the man or woman steps determinedly out into the pure, fresh air of freedom; he shivers and catches his breath at first; then his imagination runs riot among the possibilities of his new liberty. He has had little experience, he knows nothing of a true self control, in place of the outward rules and laws which thus far have restrained him; he only gloats over the pleasures he will grasp in the new life. He is like a man who has been kept all his life on one article of food for fear everything else will injure him, and who suddenly casts off the fear and determines to eat everything because he has a right to; he partakes of everything within his reach, all he can hold, and as often as he imagines food will taste good. At first he delights in this abandonment to his desires. But sooner or later, sickness, misery, incapacity to enjoy good nourishing food at all, teach him that he did not use his freedom in a way to really bring happiness after all.

Throughout society a new restlessness, a great, indefinable longing to break away from the old shackles of conventionality, laws and superstition prevails. Persons feel it who do not realize what it means. The old strict marriage laws of church and state chafe and hurt, and something new and higher and better is longed for. But among the old advocates of freedom in sex relations, those who have practiced their ideal to the fullest extent, a correspondingly great dissatisfaction and disappointment is arising. A great many are beginning to realize that they have not found the happiness they hoped for; their characters have not been strengthened and enriched by their various experiences. They have not attached any one to them with a love that lasts into old age and feebleness. In seeking their own delight they have often forgotten to see if they have bestowed the happiness on those around them they have expected out of life. Perhaps they have been indifferent to the suffering of others. The fruits they have gathered are turned to ashes in their hands, and memory brings no soothing influence. Once past the age of youth, and passion and spontaneous delight in the bare fact of life, it is sad to be able to look upon by-gone but empty pleasures—nothingness for and loneliness for old age.

Our old comrade, whose sweet, poetic thoughts many of us have pondered over with keen delight, has expressed this idea beautifully in the last number of his little journal, "Free Comrade." I hope you will read it. Every one of his little papers is well worth the reading, the writer has kept his sweetness and purity of thought through all the phases of his life. He asks that others write their suggestions of a newer and higher plane, a rule of true living that shall actually bring a real happiness.

I still believe that the only road to true happiness is by the way of complete self-mastery. We must not allow ourselves to "drift." If we fear no god or state or church, let us fear our own outraged selves. Let anger, spite, hatred, be entirely eliminated, let passion be the warmth of life that at our bidding flows over and around our activities, never let it be our master.

I do not think we can ever find our greatest happiness in seeking after it. My words may sound like the old, conventional morality which we have heard until we have become impervious to its real import. But true it is, that love, sympathy, kindliness, are real, practical and necessary things and possess deep meanings. Chasing after our own personal happiness while ignoring the feelings of others, is not the way to reach it.

"What Is a Sensible Marriage Law?"

In the "Sunday American," Chicago, of January 6, editorial section, Richard Le Gallienne, in speaking of the "Tasks of the New Century" says, "perhaps, one task, however, needs separate mention, the establishment of a sensible marriage law." In the "American," of next day the editor, under the above heading, comments thus:

Here is really an interesting suggestion which will be of importance to all men and women as long as we live on this earth and depend on the marriage relation for such little actual happiness as we find here.

Mr. Le Gallienne thinks that we need "a sensible marriage law." He therefore thinks that our present marriage law is not sensible. This is a notion that appears to be growing constantly. It is one which has suggested itself to people more or less frequently since the beginning of marriage.

All of our institutions are changing constantly, and marriage, perhaps, need not be an exception to the rule.

Our present idea is that a man and woman MUST marry in the period of youth, enthusiasm and ignorance and that they must abide by this early impulse whatever its results.

People who share Mr. Le Gallienne's views and the views of other emancipated souls feel that some other system is needed—some other system that will give to men and women a chance to make up for the preliminary mistake without humiliation, degradation or any other punishment.

Montaigne declares: "Few have married for love without repenting it."

Dr. Johnson was very happy in his marriage, yet he believed that marriages would be happier, as a rule, if they were arranged by the Lord Chancellor and not by ignorant young children.

We are inclined to think that the present marriage system is the best possible under these circumstances. It gives perfect happiness to those well mated and wisely controls those mated unfortunately. It is imperfect, of course, but not as imperfect as the beings for whom it was devised.

The time will come, doubtless, when a decent relief will be afforded from unfortunate marriages.

But we do not believe that the marriage system uniting one man and one woman for life will be abolished ever.

On the contrary, it is our opinion that as men improve in intellect and in moral sentiment they will gradually grow worthy of married life. They will select their life companions more intelligently, being better developed mentally at the age of marriage.

There is no reason, however, why we should refuse to hear what may be said in favor of changes in the laws of marriage. No laws are more important to men. We shall ask Mr. Gallienne to write his views more in detail, and we shall be glad to hear from our readers who may care to discuss this very serious problem.

For the billionth time, perhaps, the fact is herein set forth and clearly acknowledged that marriage is for MAN and NOT for woman! "As men improve in intellect and in moral sentiment they will gradually grow worthy of married life," says the editor of the "American"—who is supposed to be Arthur Brisbane of New York. "They [men] will select their life companions more intelligently," etc. "No laws are more important to MEN" than marriage laws.

True, O Brisbane! but if all-important to men, are they not equally if not still more important to women?

Or, is it true in fact, as well as in theory, that women are mere ciphers—politically, economically, morally and religiously, with no rights that men are bound to respect?

Speaking of and deprecating cruelty to animals Cowper the poet said:

"If man's convenience, health or safety interferes, his rights and claims are paramount and must extinguish theirs."

Do not our law-makers, and the editors who manufacture the public opinion that gives vitality to statute laws, argue much the same way in regard to the rights of women as Cowper did in regard to the rights of dumb beasts?

"The present marriage system. . . . is imperfect but not as imperfect as the beings for whom it was devised," says the "American."

Which of these "imperfects" is cause and which effect?

Or, is each a cause of and each an effect of the other?

Bad men, power-loving men, made a marriage system that would keep the masses of people in subjection to themselves—instead of "for whom it was devised" the writer should have said, BY whom it was devised—then this man-made machine, system, has, in all the ages, done its work well in turning out a perennial supply of "beings" so imperfect that they have to be governed—simply because conditions of motherhood were so bad that it was impossible these beings could be born strong enough and good enough to govern themselves—to be a law unto themselves.

Suggestively the saying quoted from Montaigne is valuable. Why should most people who marry for love repent it?

Is it not because the mental and psychic state of exaltation, or craze, known as love, is wholly unsuited to a matter-of-fact business partnership,—such as marriage requires and means?

Hence also the pertinence of Dr. Johnson's suggestion. He himself married for business and for comfort—not for the creation of new human beings. Such marriages could much better be arranged by the parents of the candidates for matrimony, or by the "Lord Chancellor," than by the parties most concerned.

It will be observed that Mr. Brisbane is by no means consistent in his talk about a "sensible marriage law." In direct words he upholds and commends the present system, but by indirection, that is, by suggestion, he stabs it to the heart. As when he says,—"other emancipated souls feel that some other system is needed—some other system that will give to men and women a chance to make up for a preliminary mistake without humiliation, degradation or any other punishment."

More significant still, more important still, is the offer to "hear what may be said in favor of changes in the laws of marriage." To throw open the gates or pull down the bars to free discussion of any slave system is the first and most important step towards destroying that system. So long as the slave-holding oligarchy of the Southern States could keep discussion out of congress and out of the pulpit and public press, just so long they felt secure as to the permanence of their peculiar institution, but once open to free discussion they knew that nothing but war could save it.

And just so it will be with that other peculiar institution, that jealously guarded child of the unholy alliance between church and state—our present marriage system. Free discussion will seal its doom—will ring its funeral knell.

How many of Lucifer's readers will accept this challenge?

How many will send short, crisp letters giving reasons why our present marriage system should be changed for something better, or abolished entirely—as having out-lived its usefulness, if it ever had any.

Hypnotism—Suggestive Therapeutics, etc.

For a long time I have much desired to say a few words on these subjects in Lucifer's columns, but always something else has slipped in between this desire and its fulfillment. A recent letter from a medical friend and subscriber in Iowa rouses me to the performance of what I conceive to be an important duty. Leaving out names this friend and helper says:

"In 'Suggestive Therapeutics,' 'Prof.'—advertised a ten-cent course in hypnotism. I sent for it and found it interesting, but all through the pamphlet he declared he could not fully teach the science in so small a work, but in his large book it was fully taught. Said book was sold at two dollars. Now mind you, this was to be a large book. I sent for the two dollar book and got a pamphlet containing 220 words more than his ten-cent pamphlet, which contained only twenty-eight small pages and he made it come handy to say that he had to deal honestly with the people or 'Uncle Sam would get after him for fraudulent use of his mail.' I have proved several of those self-styled 'Professors' and found them all frauds. Not one of them knows anything about psychology."

The power of mind over the bodily functions is no new doctrine or theory as we all know. More than fifty years ago I was a frequent witness to performances very similar to those performed by hypnotists of the present day, and my attention was often called to this class of subjects by my teachers in school. Among other lessons very distinctly remembered is the following:

In 1849 hundreds of people were dying of epidemic cholera in St. Louis not far from the school I was then attending, and when one of the pupils, from eating unripe apples or some other indigestible food, exhibited some of the symptoms of the much dreaded disease, there was something of a panic. The principal called the students together and gave them a lecture in mental science, that would have done credit to the present day experts who charge us from one to ten dollars, or even more, per lesson. Among other illustrations of what suggestion can do he told us of the French prisoner killed by the doctors who told him he was to be slowly bled to death instead of guillotined. The condemned man was placed on a dissecting table, bound, blindfolded, his arm bandaged in the usual way. Then the click of the lancet was heard; warm water made to flow from the bandaged arm to a vessel beneath. Not a drop of blood was drawn and yet the man died within the time the doctors told him he would die—died of hypnotic suggestion.

Every student of history, of philosophy, and especially of psychology, knows that there is really nothing new in the teachings of Mrs. Eddy and her numerous imitators. But Mrs. Eddy achieved wealth and fame by utilizing what previous experimenters discovered, and now the country literally swarms with "Professors," "Doctors," "healers," etc., each of whom would make us believe that he or she has made a wonderful discovery; a discovery that will abolish pain, disease, poverty and even death itself!

As a sample of the style and claims of those who teach the art of healing all disease, of themselves and others, I quote from a little pamphlet sent us some weeks ago, from a western state. In giving instruction to a pupil the "Prof." says:

Say to your Hynoptized subject, "You are feeling very stout." See by a test that he is stout. Say to him that he will be this [sic] stout when awake, and no thought of weakness can ever enter his mind. Make this very impressive on your subject, repeating several times the same suggestion that when he is awake he will have perfect health, feel very happy, and be constantly filled with Divine love all the time in the future, and strength of body, too; a love in strength and faith that nothing can ever shatter, and that he will never be sick, but will preserve youth perpetually. If he be an old man tell him that he is coming back to youth again, etc.

Not all who assume the role of teachers of the art of "Hypnotic Control," "Self-Hypnotic Healing" etc., show so little acquaintance with the recognized standards of use of the Queen's English, but so far as I have read their books and lessons they all show little regard for clearness of expression, or literary accuracy, leaving an unpleasant impression in the mind of the reader that their ability to give "scientific" instruction in the art of curing or preventing disease, poverty, etc., is not of the best or highest.

The role of public censor is by no means a pleasant one to him who is keenly conscious of his own shortcomings, and therefore I wish to disclaim any intention of setting myself up as a model, in any respect, for others to follow. "Judge not, etc.," is a maxim that should prevent all harsh criticism of our fellow humans. We, as publishers have allowed several persons to advertise, in Lucifer's columns, their books on hypnotism, suggestion, personal magnetism, magnetation, etc., without examining very carefully into the merits of the advertised books. The heavy daily drafts upon our time and strength forbid such examination, and even if carefully examined we should hesitate to sit in judgment upon and condemn any book or course of lessons as fraudulent. We give our readers the credit of being able to judge for themselves and take the consequences of such judgment.

A good plan for self protection against imposture would be to ask the advertiser to send a copy of his book, or a sample lesson, for examination with privilege of returning if not suited. If our Iowa friend and subscriber had taken this precaution he need not have wasted his two dollars on a small and to him worthless pamphlet.

In conclusion I would say that while impugning no man's or woman's motives I decidedly disapprove the almost universal habit indulged in by these teachers and healers, the habit of charging extravagant prices for their instruction, whether in book form or otherwise, thus making the uncomfortable impression that the almighty dollar is the chief object in life with them, and not the good they can do to their fellow human beings; and yet, for those who have "money to burn" perhaps it is just as well that they burn it in this as in any other way.

Comment - Various.

THE PREVENTIVE CHECK.

The letter of Mrs. M. T. of Ohio was written to Daughter Lillian and is a fair sample of many received at this office inquiring for a safe and harmless yet "positive means of prevention," or reliable check against further increase of family. Mrs. T. thinks four small children are quite enough to care for, with less than forty dollars per month for all expenses of six persons.

Some of our friends would doubtless recommend Dianism; others Oneida continence; others separate beds and asceticism or celibacy, until such time of life as mother nature makes reproduction no longer possible.

To all of these methods of living there are serious objections, and upon all other methods of prevention our population-loving paternal rulers have put their veto, with heavy pains and penalties for those who impart the desired instruction.

What can we do? What ought we to do, as publishers, as citizens, as neighbors and well-wishers of our fellow-human beings? The cold hard walls of the penitentiary are not desirable as a dwelling place, as some of us have proved by experience. What better can we do than to continue the effort to awaken public sentiment, to arouse the dormant public conscience until the stupid masses demand their birthright to knowledge? Demand the citizen right to manage their own affairs, including their bodies, in their own way, so long as they invade not the equal rights of others.

GOVERNING ALL THE PEOPLE.

The newly inaugurated governor of Illinois, Richard Yates tells the people that when he became a candidate he made the promise that if elected he would be the governor of all the people of Illinois and now he means to faithfully carry out that promise.

The love of governing others seems innate and irrepressible. Why not let each govern herself and himself so long as she or he invades not the equal rights of others?

No government of man by man, or of woman by woman, or of woman by man, or man by woman, is ever really needed. All that is needed to secure justice, equity, freedom, peace and happiness in the social arrangement is an agency for the of those who will not or cannot keep from invading others.

KANSAS AND COLORADO LYNCHINGS.

The late lynchings of negroes charged with rape by the citizens of Denver and Leavenworth show that the middle west is really little more advanced in civilization than is the southland, which is commonly believed to be the native home of the savage and brutal lyncher. Ignorance—law-enforced ignorance in regard to sex, race-hatred and the vengeful feelings fostered by worship of a vengeful god, are the chief causes of such shocking occurrences as that which but yesterday blackened the escutcheon of the state called Kansas.

VARIOUS VOICES.

P. Olssen, Little Rock, Ark.:—Enclosed find $1, for which renew my subscription for another year; also a list of names for sample copies. If possible send No. 845. I wish you all success in your work, and I will say, that for interesting, instructive and truthful reading, your paper has my full appreciation. I would not object to a continued story in Lucifer.

J. C. S., Minneapolis, Minn.:—Am just in receipt of Light-Bearer Library No. 9 and think both of the writers are excellent. Walker speaks of "a mutual maternity insurance association" long ago suggested by Clarence Swartz. Can you give in some issue of Lucifer some further details of such an idea? It is new to me and I presume may be to many others.

Mrs. Vander C., Chattanooga, Tenn.:—Inclosed please find $1 75, for which please send me Lucifer, Vol. III., cloth. Have you any more bound volumes? and if so, for what years are they? I will renew my subscription, as I find it almost impossible to get along without the dear old paper. I think "Light Bearer Library" is simply fine. Long may our Moses be spared to continue to spread the light of truth through this land of darkest ignorance. I will send some names which you may send sample copies of Lucifer to, as I think they may possibly become subscribers.

Mrs. R. B. Bruce, Michigan:—I wish to express my thorough appreciation of Sadie A. Magoon's ideal of love. When that love is recognized by all women there will be no Josephine Irvings with lives stretching beyond them "a grey, level waste." Brief infatuations, spasms of passion, hypnotic dreams of love will be valued at only what they are worth and will leave no scars. Love will not be centralized in one person but will be received from all and flow out to all.

J. H. Young, Onset, Mass.:—Sorry I could not renew before, but "better late than never." However, don't stop either Lucifer or the Light-Bearer Library until I leave this body, or stop them myself. I enclose $1.50 which takes Lucifer to 882, and Light-Bearer Library for 1901 or Vol. II. A friend says he will take a copy of your book as soon as published. You can send me three copies two are paid for, other will be. Should be glad to help Lillian if I could. I'm young yet, only seventy-eight, and who knows what may turn up.

Jacob Hause, Hagerstown, Md.:—I received a number of your paper a few weeks ago. You will please find enclosed one dollar for the coming year.

[This brief letter is inserted to encourage our friends everywhere to continue sending us names of those who would possibly if not probably be interested enough in Lucifer's work to send for a trial subscription for three months, if not for a full year. If a few stamps can be sent with the names the favor would be much appreciated, but send the names anyway, please. M. H.]

A., New York:—Several of Lucifer's readers want serial stories in the paper. Have they asked themselves where they are to get them? Who are to be the writers? One does not need all the fingers of one hand with which to count the good stories of a radical trend and purpose which have been written. One does not need the fingers of both hands with which to count the good radical and freethought stories written to date. Most of the attempts in either line have been crude abortions, each a shame to literature, inartistic, ungrammatical, clumsy and in effective in construction. We are paupers in the imaginative field.

J. W. G., Dallas, Tex.:—I am very well pleased indeed with "When Love is Liberty and Nature Law." It is the most satisfactory pamphlet on the subject I have yet seen, not even excepting "Cupid's Yokes." By the way, can you not procure me a copy of that little book? I have not read it for twenty years, and would like to have a copy. What has become of Heywood? I don't see anything about him in Lucifer. Are the Oneida and Wallingford Communities still in existence? If so, are they prosperous? What is their present population, wealth etc. Can you obtain for me a history of the above Communities? I inclose five cents; please send me "The New Hedonism."

["Cupid's Yokes" is out of print, and not procurable anywhere as far as we know. Mr. Heywood died in Boston in '93, about a year after his release from prison. The Oneida and Wallingford communities are not in existence as originally planned. The Oneida Community still exists; but the central ideas and practices have been abandoned. We have "The Oneida Community; a record of an attempt to carry out the principles of Christian unselfishness and scientific race-improvement." By Allen Estlake, member of Oneida Community. Price $1.—L. H.]

Mrs. M. T—; Ohio:—I determined many moons ago to write to you and remit subscription on Lucifer long over due.

Hoping that in this case it is better late than never, I hereby enclose one dollar for which you will please move up the number on my wrapper to the right notch. We have been reading your paper at irregular intervals ever since 1888 but only became a regular subscriber last August, when my husband visited your office while at Chicago. We had lost track of Lucifer completely until then but we will hold fast from now on, and expect to subscribe for the Library, soon, although my time and money are both limited, which you will understand when I tell you that I have four small children to take care of, and constant fear of more, coupled with the fact that my husband receives less than forty dollars per month for his labor. And now, dear friend, I am going to ask a great favor. I want you to tell me a positive means of prevention, as you know the position I am in, so I hope you will come to my relief. Of course we understand the law says "no," but we have progressed far enough to believe we are capable of being a law unto ourselves, being entirely free from superstition of all kinds; so you need have no hesitation in imparting any knowledge of which you may be possessed. I enclose stamps for reply.

Frederica de l'Espinasse, Iowa:—You have had some splendid articles lately, and I have eagerly read comments concerning "A Lesson From Life." All the logic in the world will not help one to whom life seems a "grey level waste" any more than in a loss by death. Time is the only healer. According to some we should train our children to be more shallow. Perhaps it is best so in the battle of life. But shallow, superficial natures have never moved the world. Perhaps it is not worth while to move the world; "Too much concentration," perhaps. But with less concentration where would reformers be? Where would Lucifer be if its editor was less intense?

And there is not the satisfaction in a shallow affection than there is in one of deeper root. Variety is not a woman's ideal. Under existing social conditions, children are best brought up under the guidance of both parents. Sex attraction should not be all of life. In a long-mated pair where this has long died out there can still exist a deep regard and an intense affection. This is perhaps sentimentalism. But sentiment and theory are half of life and different characters can not follow one rule.

My little daughter startled me the other day, telling me that her teacher was to give the class in physiology a lecture on the organs of sex. Only the girls were permitted to attend; those having scruples on the subject might be excused. It was the teacher's first attempt at instruction of this kind and she seemed confused and blushed painfully. The lecture consisted mainly in sanitary hints as to approaching maturity. The next day the boys attended a lecture on the same subject not by their usual instructor (a woman) but one of the male teachers. So at last even in prudish Iowa sex is recognized. A step forward. Some time afterward the high school had a book contest. Each pupil was to have a sign representing some well-known book. My May chose "The Heavenly Twins"—represented by two nude baby dolls as sexless as a school physiology. On entering the room the shocked teacher told her to wrap them in tissue paper. Oh, for more light to make the coming generation better, morally and physically!

Hath man no second life?
Pitch this one high!
Sits there no judge in heaven, our sins to see?
More strictly, then, the inward judge obey.
—Matthew Arnold.

Unwise it is to boast, my friend, if grim defeat hath found thee;
Unnecessary is the boast if glad success hath crowned thee.
—J. K. V. Cooke.

THE
British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Guiders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

Mill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages. 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Paper covers 50 cents, Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul. "Another true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do no all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed?

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., No. 2. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, JAN. 26, E. M. 400. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE No. 849.

More Legalized Robbery—The Govan Case.

When, in October last, the prosecution against Messrs. Moore and Hughes for alleged violation of the postal laws was withdrawn and the case dismissed without trial, the following paragraph was written and printed in Lucifer as part of its editor's opinion of the legal and moral effect of that failure to convict.

While sincerely congratulating our Kentucky contemporaries on their release from the annoyance and expense of legal proceedings in defense of the right of free publication, and while joining with them in the hope that no such prosecution will again disgrace our already deeply disgraced national judiciary, I for one do not share editor Moore's roseate and self-gratulatory view as to the thoroughness of the work done by the "Blade," or as to the lasting effect of this latest defeat of the officials whose business it is to meddle with other people's business. These officials usually care but little for the merits of the cases brought by them into court. With them it is business, business first, last and all the time. A few failures to convict, as in the case of J. B. Caldwell of this city, and now that of the "Blue Grass Blade," will by no means discourage these invasive meddlers, these money-loving and power-loving officials. Until the general public shall awake to the necessity of wiping out the laws that give authority to such invasions of personal liberty these prosecutions against speech and press will continue.

Scarcely had this prophecy time to reach its readers when Chas. L. Govan, editor of "Discontent," a small weekly paper published at Home, Washington, was arrested on a charge very similar to that under which the Kentucky editor and publisher had been prosecuted. I have not yet seen a copy of the indicted article upon which the prosecution against Govan was based, but inasmuch as no one is alleged to have been slandered or otherwise injured by its publication I conclude that this prosecution was simply another of the many invasions of citizen right by the censors of press and mails, that have indellibly disgraced the records of the American judiciary for near a third of the century just closed.

Having little time to look up the matter I herewith insert a letter written by one who has given much of his time and money to aiding the victims of the officials who seem to have no other business than meddling invasively with the business of other people. For reasons best known to himself this friend and correspondent prefers that his name be withheld, for the present at least. Not that he wishes to evade responsibility, in the least, but probably in goodmeasure because he does not wish to have his benevolent acts paraded before the public eye. With a very few editorial changes this is what our correspondent has to say of the Govan case:

The account given in Lucifer of the judicial outrage committed on Mr. C. L. Govan in the United States court at Seattle, though by a friend of the victim and an eye witness, is singularly moderate and inadequate. It is the "worst yet" instance of abuse of that much-perverted obscenity law.

It was said that the last case against C. C. Moore was the "worst case yet", but the gathering of his friends in force, and the due preparation for a big fight, scared off the prosecutors and saved him a trial.

Thus that attempt at villainy was foiled by publicity, and by prompt exhibition of vigilance.

Now, in the Govan case, so far as I have been able to ascertain the facts, it is all outrage. There was no just cause of indictment, for the matter was, as in Moore's last case, merely an expression that some would regard as immoral. The trend of the article indicted was simply that young folks suitably mated and mutually attracted might well join hands for parentage without asking consent of church or state—that the latter had no right to step in and interfere or compel a fee for the union of hearts and hands. There is no flavor of salacity or licentiousness or obscenity in the article condemned. It is as straight, clean and well put as any such argument could be; and the judge who sustained Moore's demurrer would have necessarily done the same for Govan, had the case come before him; but the "learned" judge of Seattle took advantage of the ignorance and poverty, the meekness and necessity of the victim before him and told him it was plainly a case where the law applied; that there was nothing for him to do but plead guilty and pay a fine. Between this judge and the "cordial" district attorney, they discovered Govan's assets were $100—all he possessed in the world and after frightening him by their show of power and talk of imprisonment, they bulldozed him into pleading guilty, whereupon he was mulcted by a fine of $75 and costs of nearly $24—thus judiciously robbing him of all he had.

Never was a meaner job put up by bunco-steerers, than by these official confidence operators. These officers were in a position to know that the man before them was not guilty; that the law could not be fairly construed to apply against him; that it had recently been interpreted as not covering merely immoral arguments (in the Moore case), and it was their business to protect him in his rights, instead of to inflict wrong upon him, and punish him by fining him all he was worth.

If a more degrading exhibition of official lawlessness and bigotry has ever been offered in a court of this country, let it be cited, or let this case stand as the height of absurdity and worst case of injustice yet perpetrated under the oft-perverted and misconstrued obscenity laws.

I need not remind the readers of Lucifer that Govan is but a poor printer; that he is living in a pioneer settlement of poor people, that they are minding their own primitive business and maintaing a hard struggle for small comforts of a home in a wilderness. One of their small solaces was freedom of expression, through their little sheet called "Discontent," and now come the emissaries of Government to abridge even this constitutional right, and make them justly more discontented than ever. Such an outrage would be the best possible way to convert philosophical, harmless anarchists into the dynamiting kind, and many a man who now believes in some laws would prefer none, with the abolition of government, if such abuse of law were of common occurrence.

The result in the Moore case shows that a judge of a United States Court can make a just decision when the eyes of the world are being directed upon him, while this last case in Seattle shows what dirty work they will do to please a clergyman (who made the complaint) and spite a freethinker, when they can get him in a corner and overcome him with pomposity before his friends can be rallied to protect him.

Govan made a mistake in allowing himself to be so readily fleeced by plausible officials who only too well knew the weakness of their prosecution, and were anxiously hasty for a plea of guilty instead of a trial; but one can easily imagine himself in Govan's predicament, taking the shortest cut home, knowing the power and mercilessness of the wolves that had cornered him.

While I wish he had nerve to fight it out, yet I am as sorry for him as the good Samaritan for the man who fell among thieves, and I propose to bear a good portion of his loss, hoping that others will come forward and follow suit, so that Mr. Govan may be reimbursed the whole amount of the $95 of which he was so unjustly despoiled.

Since penning the above I have happened on an article by Ella Wheeler Wilcox in "Evening Journal," of Jan. 15, containing this bold belief: "I believe the woman who resigns herself utterly to a man through love, without marriage, is a much better woman morally than the woman who marries the man she does not love. But I insist that this is a very foolish and unwise person; and that her happiness in her love cannot last. . . . I have never met or heard from one 'common law wife' (or mistress) whose happiness lasted through a score of years."

This belief of Mrs. Wilcox, in the first sentence quoted is certainly heterodox, and would be regarded as immoral by Mrs. Grundyites, and after the decision of the Seattle Judge he would if consistent, convict and fine any publisher in his district who should quote this "Journal" article.

If Uncle Sam were an argus-eyed and impartial ruler he would either refund Govan's fine with apology, or direct his New York officials to prosecute Mrs. Wilcox and her publisher under the same law that mulcted Govan. Since our Uncle will do neither, I will do my part to share Govan's loss, and hope others will feel the same way about it. His address is C. L. Govan, Home, Wash.

Lucifer's method is and has been to allow all correspondents to dress their thought in their own language, and yet I could wish that in this impeachment of the Seattle officials our earnest and sympathetic friend had left out such words and phrases as "wolves," "dirty work," etc. The old Romans had a maxim, SUAVITER IN MODO, etc.—"mild in manner", that it would be well for us to remember, and yet I confess to finding it hard at all times to utilize the wisdom couched in this old time maxim. Our zealous friend is himself a philosopher and knows that these invasive officials are the victims of heredity and environment, as are all the rest of us; that the system under which they work is chiefly responsible for the wrongs committed and that so long as these laws remain in force there will not be lacking instruments to use and abuse them. "The thing, the thing itself is the abuse," as Burke said of all artificial government.

Robert Burns.

Elbert Hubbard in "Little Journeys to the Homes of English Authors."

The business of Robert Burns was love-making. All love is good, but some kinds of love are better than others. Through Burns' penchant for falling in love we have his songs.

A Burns biography is simply a record of his love affairs, and the spasms of repentance that followed his lapses are made manifest in religious verse.

Poetry is the very earliest form of literature, and is the natural expression of a person in love; and I suppose we might as well admit the fact at once, that without love there would be no poetry.

Poetry is the bill and coo of sex.

All poets are lovers, and all lovers, either actual or potential, are poets. Potential poets are the people who read poetry, and so without lovers the poet would never have a market for his wares.

If you cease to be moved by religious emotions; if your spirit is no longer surged by music and you do not linger over certain lines of poetry, it is because the love instinct in your heart has withered to ashes of roses It is idle to imagine Bobby Burns as a staid member of the Kirk; had he been, there would now be no Bobby Burns.

The literary ebullitions of Robert Burns, he himself has told us, began shortly after he reached the age of indiscretion; and the occasion was his being paired in the hay-field, according to Scottish custom, with a bonnie lassie. This custom of pairing still endures, and is what the students of sociology call an expeditious move.

The Scotch are great economists—the greatest in the world. Adam Smith, the father of the science of economics, was a Scotchman and Draper, author of "A History of Civilization" flatly declares that Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations" has influenced the people of earth for good more than any book ever written—save none. The Scotch are great conservators of energy.

The practice of pairing men and women in the hay-field gets the work done. One man and woman going down the grass-grown path afield might linger and dally by the way. They would never make hay, but a company of a dozen or more men and women would not only reach the field but would do a lot of work. In Scotland the hay-harvest is short—when the grass is in bloom, just right to make the best hay, it must be cut. And so the men and women, the boys and girls sally forth. It is a jolly picnic time, looked forward to with fond anticipation, and gazed back upon with sweet sad memories, or otherwise as the case may be.

But they all make hay while the sun shines and count it joy. Liberties are allowed during haying time that otherwise would be declared scandalous; during haying time the Kirk waives her censor's right and priest and people mingle joyously.

Wives are not jealous during hay-harvest, and husbands never fault-finding because they each get even by allowing a mutual license.

In Scotland during haying time every married man works along-side of some other man's wife. To the psychologist it is somewhat curious how the desire for propriety is over-ridden by a stronger desire—the desire for the shilling. The Scotch farmer says "anything to get the hay in"—and by loosening a bit the strict bands of social custom the hay is harvested.

In the hay-harvest the law of natural selection holds; and trysts continue year after year. Old lovers meet, touch hands in a friendly scuffle for a fork, drink from the same jug, recline at noon and eat lunch in the shade of a friendly stock and talk to heart's content as they Maud Muller on a summer's day.

Of course this joyousness of the haying-time is not wholly monopolized by the Scotch. Haven't you seen the jolly haying parties in Southern Germany, France, Switzerland and the Tyrol? How the bright costumes of the men and jaunty attire of the women gleam in the glad sunshine! But the practice of pairing is carried to a degree of perfection in Scotland that I have not noticed elsewhere. Surely it is a great economic scheme!

It is like that invention of a Connecticut man which utilizes the ebb and flow of the ocean tides to turn a gristmill. And it seems queer that no one has ever attempted to utilize the waste of dynamic force involved in the maintainance of the company sofa.

In Ayrshire I have started out with a haying party of twenty—ten men and ten women—at six o'clock in the morning and worked until six at night. I never worked so hard or did so much. All day long there was a fire of jolly jokes and jibes, interpersed with song, while beneath all ran a gentle hum of confidential interchange of thought. The man who owned the field was there to direct our efforts and to urge us on by merry raillery, threat and joyous rivalry. The point in this—we did the work.

Take heed, ye Captains of Industry and note this truth, that when men and women work together, under right influences, much good is accomplished and the work is pleasurable. Of course there are vinegar-faced philosophers who say that the Scotch custom of pairing young men and maidens in the hay-field is not without its effect on esoterics, also on vital statistics; and I'm willing to admit there may be danger in the scheme, but life is a dangerous business anyway—few get out of it alive.

COMMENTS BY ALBINA L. WASHBURN.

Dear Lucifer:—I send you this extract from one of Hubbard's booklets. Once in a while, you see, he says a good thing—inadvertently as it were. In his rambling way, through many digressions he throws out suggestions good for us all.

He is a wise poultry-man who scatters the wheat among the straw knowing—perhaps—that we need the exercise of scratching for it. There is very little of Bobby Burns in this opening chapter but Lucifer readers and admirers of Wm. Morris will recognize a reminder of his haying scenes as told in "News from Nowhere" under the longed for socialistic regime of the future. Toward the end of Hubbard's booklet he sums up wisely again.

"Sex was the rock on which Robert Burns split. He seemed to regard pleasure-seeking as the prime end of life, and in this he was not so very far removed from the prevalent civilized notion of marriage. But it is a fantasmal idea and makes a mock of marriage, serving the satirist his excuse. To a great degree the race is yet barbaric and as a people we fail utterly to touch the hem of the garment of Divinity. We have been mired in the superstition that sex is unclean, and therefore honesty and expression in love matters have been tabooed. But the day will yet dawn when we will see that it takes two to generate thought; that there is the male man and the female man and only where these two walk together hand and hand is there a perfect sanity and a perfect physical, moral and spiritual health. We will yet realize that a sex relationship which does not symbol a spiritual condition is sacrilege." . . . "In their love affairs women are seldom wise nor men just. How should they be when but yesterday woman was a chattel and man a slave-owner?" . . . "The marriage of the mind is the only compact that endures. I love you because you love the things that I love. The man alone is great who utilizes the blessings that God provides; and of these blessings no gift equals the gentle trusting companionship of a good woman."

Things by Their Right Name.

BY CARRIE.

You will find enclosed one dollar, which pays for Lucifer a few months yet, and then I think you may discontinue it. The little paper came to me at a time in my progress (for I am growing) when I stood in need of the help it rendered. I was needing the courage to take a step toward freedom that its bugle call for liberty helped greatly to supply. So I shall always think of Lucifer as a friend who, at an opportune moment came with a proffered hand.

I shall dispose of the papers I have on hand, have already placed part where I hope they may do good both to the readers and by way of adding to your list of subscribers.

As I have said, Lucifer has been a real good to me, but, as with the growing wheat there are always tares, so with the high, true thought of Lucifer's select few there is the lower thought of the multitude, and this thought of the multitude bothers me. I have never read a number of the paper that hasn't induced more or less mental revolt. That few people realize that there is a lower and higher in the expression of sex is clearly proved when they are allowed free expression of thought as in Lucifer. Sex desire, sex attraction of whatever grade they denominate as love, though a monster capable of infinite selfishness shouldn't be called by that pure name.

If it could be understood that sex is an evolution, and if certain thinkers would stop rolling every expression in the universe into one great lump and labeling it with one name, it might result in lessening the confusion on this subject. These thinkers having concluded that primary substance is one and indivisible, think it not necessary to make distinctions. But it should be remembered that we are not living in the world of abstraction, of unorganized substance, but in the world of expression; that instead of one there is many; instead of the indivisible there is the divisible; and instead of the uncreate there is the ever-to-be created. If this is remembered we shall act accordingly and not hesitate to find a name for each of the multitudinous expressions.

We (real sane people) do not call the roots of a tree it's perfect blossom, no more do we it's trunk, it's limbs, or it's leaves. Each of these expressions represent to us stages of growth that necessarily precede the ultimate expression—the blossoms or the fruit. Just so we must view the tree of sex. If we read it aright we perceive that it has roots and also power to put forth the blossom of love in it's most perfect form. But because sex holds this grand possibility we shouldn't confound matters and call its lower or root expression after the name of the higher. That would be like calling a hen's egg a chicken, simply because the egg holds the latent possibility of the chick.

Dr. Chrisman, the now noted Kansas Professor, believed in calling things by their right names. He had another name than love for sex as he had learned it through experience and observation and that is why he is noted. Like the average man he had stopped at the root stage of sex expression and believing he had found all there is in sex, thought it no harm to announce his conclusions publicly. So he innocently told an audience of several thousand women (I was one of them) that a man never loved; that woman alone was capable of love; that indeed she was all love; that it was sex attraction, sex desire, that caused a man to seek the association of woman.

Now the audience, being the assembled congress of mothers, and therefore women of experience, showed no sign of dissenting from this plain proposition, though the papers reported far and wide that they resisted with great indignation the idea that they weren't loved. But that was a false report by men reporters or editors. At that juncture the women were still as mice. It was subsequent statements that turned the audience into a scene of commotion and brought many women excitedly to their feet. His inclination to narrow the sphere of woman to that of mere motherhood, making her simply a machine for the turning out of produce, didn't please his hearers; but their remonstrance reached its limit when he divorced fatherhood from any responsibility other than that of bread-winner. The mothers with one voice declared that they believed as thoroughly in the responsibility of fatherhood as they did in motherhood.

To be sure! mutual father and mother interest is as essential to ideal parenthood, and the fine, true instincts of woman are not slow in recognizing this ideal law of nature.

Dr. Chrisman knew enough about sex to christen correctly its lower expression; further than that—well, we'll excuse him. He's a man. But men learn, and the world moves, and with it sex is moving toward a higher, fuller expression. That the peoples of the world have lived mostly in the roots of their sex life could not be avoided since the sex nature cannot run ahead of the mind of man. It is only through the evolution of the higher moral and spiritual faculties of the mind that sex can be lifted to its true plane.

Wisdom and love are ordained to go hand in hand. Neither can proceed far without the other, and both will enter heaven or harmony at the same stroke of the clock of time.

Death of Two Millionaires.

A few weeks ago the daily papers had much to say of the death, the life, character and fortune of Chicago's richest citizen—Philip D. Armor, the king of butchers and meat packers. In order that this man should be able to leave millions to his children and grandchildren, many thousands of other people's children must want the common necessaries of life. This man Armour was connected with, if not chief manager of several trusts by which food is made dear to those who, by the use of machinery and the monopoly of nature's wealth, are compelled to live from day to day on the scantiest supply of food, and who are thus driven, in thousands of instances, to the commission of crime or to suicide.

Today—Jan. 23—the papers are literally filled with pictures of and brief histories of another millionaire who died yesterday—Victoria Guelph, better known as Queen of England and Empress of India.

"Nothing of the dead except good," was the old Latin maxim. Say nothing of dead or living except true! would be a better guide for our tongues and pens, with the possible addition, "nothing set down in malice." The lives of public men and women are object lessons of the greatest value to those who would learn to avoid the dangers that beset human life, but how are we to shun the errors, the mistakes, of those who have lived before us if we are not to know what those mistakes were?

We are told that Victoria Guelph died possessed of a private fortune valued at twenty-five millions of dollars. As she was not allowed, by the rules of her class, to do any really useful work or to engage in traffic or speculations of any kind, the question naturally arises, how came she into possession of so much wealth? Did it come to her by inheritance? If so how did her royal ancestors or other relatives get it?

The natural presumption is that it was largely if not wholly saved out of the royal revenues raised by taxation from the people, and since we know that taxes of every kind are paid by labor it follows that these twenty-five millions of dollars, together with the much larger sums that were spent on the royal household during Victoria's reign of sixty-three years—all, all came from the ill-paid labor of toilers in the mine, the factory, the shop or on the farm.

But however produced or earned we know that for many years millions of Queen Victoria's subjects in India have died from hunger every year, to say nothing of the poor of London and other large English cities that are forever on the verge of starvation.

To offset the terrible indictment based upon these cold, hard, indisputable facts, much is said of Victoria's kindness of heart; that she climbed up the steps to an upper room to visit a sick servant; that she gave a few shillings now and then in charity, etc., all of which is doubtless true, and so long as the world of mankind thinks more of charity than of justice we may expect such little acts of kindness as these to outweigh the gigantic robberies by which Queen Victoria and Philip D. Armour died the honored possessors of millions while their victims were starving. M. H.

The Consumer's Interest.

The time was in this country when the question of fuel was not one of absorbing interest to the great mass of population. The abounding forests furnished what seemed a never-ending supply of material for heating the dwellings of the people, as well as for driving machinery, smelting ores, etc., etc.

To monopolize and control this seemingly exhaustless supply of fuel appeared quite impossible, and hence the question of whether a monopoly of the supply of coal was within the power of the conscienceless speculator did not greatly trouble the average householder or small manufacturer.

Now, however, all this is changed. For the greater part of the population of the cities and towns of the United States, as well as for many millions who live in villages and on farms, the fact that a few men can control the price of coal is a fact of tremendous significance.

It means no less than life or death to thousands if not millions of people. High priced coal means insufficient heating for those who have little money and no credit. It means also insufficient food and clothing because so little money is left after the coal bill is paid. The lack of heating and lack of food and clothing mean death—in numberless instances from pneumonia, consumption of the lungs, cancer, and from many other diseases that might have been avoided had it not been for the conscienceless greed of the few members of a coal trust.

Speaking of recent operations of this kind the New York "World" has this to say:

Will the great body of coal-consumers gain or lose by the complete elimination of the factor of competition between coal-producers and coal-carriers?

Editor Sayward of the "Coal Trade Journal" tells "The World" that "without any advance to the consumer" the colossal combination called into existence by Mr. J. P. Morgan "will reap an additional profit of fifty cents a ton." In other words, by a mere lopping off of competing expenditures now made unnecessary by combination the profits on the sale of 50,000,000 tons of anthracite coal will be increased by $52,000,000.

It is clear enough that the mass of consumers have no interest in preventing a reduction of $25,000,000 a year in the cost of mining, hauling and delivering coal. On the other hand it is not yet clear that they have any interest in seeing that reduction brought about. But they would have if the combination, having dispensed with the middlemen and their salaries and closed up superfluous agencies, should divide the net saving of fifty cents a ton with the people. A reduction of twenty-five cents a ton on the retail price of coal would quickly reconcile the public to Mr. Morgan's mammoth consolidation. But will the consumer be allowed to share in the profits of suppressing competition?

The prediction made on Wall street that within two years all the important railway systems will be reduced to five, and those five will be operated in concert and not in competition, raises the same question as to railroad rates, both for passengers and freight. If the consolidated railroad management, after saving uncalculated millions by reducing expenses, divided fairly with the public by giving it better service, with lower fares and freight charges, the public would not complain.

But if the retail price of coal remains as high after as before consolidation, and railroad charges the same, what then?

Comments—Various.

Replying to Edward Stern's questions—see "Voices"—I would say:

First—I know of no experiments except those of ordinary land surveyors, or civil engineers, "to project a straight line upon the earth's surface."

Second—Do not know of any one whose life is devoted to physical research who has attempted a serious reply to the "geodetic work of the Koreshans." If I were to venture an opinion on the subject it would be that some of the conclusions of the Koreshans seem so palpably, so monstrously absurd and irrational that men engaged in scientific pursuits for truth's sake are thereby prejudiced against anything really valuable that the Koreshans may have discovered.

Third—Am not prepared to say whether it be a fact that a ship's hull hidden from ordinary sight by the curve in the earth's surface can be brought again into view by a telescope, but if true I would think it probably owing to some imperfectly understood power of refraction in the telescopic lenses themselves.

With Mr. Stern I confess to having the "greatest respect for truth"—for its own sake, and hence I am wary of the teachings of those who follow science not for truth's sake but for some ulterior object, such as establishing a hierarchy, a theocracy, with some man or woman at its head.

And this seems just what the Koreshans are doing. To revive an old world theocracy with a new order, a celibate order of priests and priestesses; to rescue science and morals from the "infidel" or "ungodly" leaders, such as Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Wallace, Buchner et al, and restore mankind to its "Edenic" condition—these are the objects of a sect that seem growing in numbers with a rapidity almost rivalling that of the now famous John Alexander Dowie.

SOCIETY OF ANTHROPOLOGY.

Last Sunday afternoon Dr. Charles T. Lewis read a paper on the "History of Medicine," followed by the usual discussion. Next Sunday afternoon Jan. 27, Honore Jaxon will tell the Society what he knows of the American Indians, among whom he claims to have been born and bred.

What is Sin?

Under the head of What is the Most Striking Thought you ever Heard or Read or Originated, a "Club" man reported the following:

"'Fichte defines sin as persistence in relations.'

"'What does that mean?' I thought. 'It is about as clear as mud to me.'

"But he [Dr. Rainsford] went on to explain. The fundamental principle of life is growth, therefore change. To 'persist in relations' is to cling to the dead leaves and rotten branches of last season instead of shedding them and permitting the growth of new and useful and living branches and leaves. 'Persistence in relations' is the idea of yesterday retained in the clearer light and broader knowledge of today. It is civilization clinging to the barbarisms of the past, to war and oppression and cruelty and intolerance. It is the individual man holding on to ideals, to lines of conduct, to modes of work that were right enough for him once, but are utterly wrong now; it is retaining the greed, the selfishness, the rapacity, the irresponsibility of ignorant childhood after one has reached a higher and better understanding of rights and duties.

"After he had made this explanation I saw that the German philosopher had summed up in those three words—persistence in relations—the whole matter of wrong relations of man with with man, man with nature, nations with one another."

The Song of the Woman

They'll never have done with the fightin' on land an' over sea;
Government—government, what does it care—what does it care for me?
Bugles must blow an' flags must wave, an' the muffled drums must beat,
An' what to a lass is a lover when they lay him dead at her feet?

They'll never have done with the fightin', forward the columns sweep;
I hear the shout o' the captains as I tread the hearth an' weep.
Far off an' faint—but I hear it; an' a white dead face I see,
Under the sod in the grave that God an' government made for me!

His hair was like the raven's wing. (I joy that my lips have prest,
As it fell in its flowing beauty, this dark lock on my breast),
An' his brave, bright eyes looked love to m'ne—the eyes I shall never see,
Till God at the great white Judgment Day shall give him back to me.

Bible they've got for battles. For men have fought an' died,
Ere the Prince of Peace said strife should cease—the Prince that they crucified.
Though a woman's tears bedew the years, shall they stay the crimson tide?
What can you do with government with Bible on its side?

Men must fight the battles; lover an' lass must part;
But what is a star of glory to a woman's broken heart?
Government's right, they tell me, an' the wrong must righted be,
Give the lass then to her lover—an' my dead love back to me!

Cease Making Criminals.

Dr. Magnus Hearsfeld in "Philadelphia Times"

In nine out of ten countries one can obtain divorce only at the cost of crime.

There was once a legislator who had experienced all the pangs and disappointments of unhappy married life on his own body—Frederick the Great. He was of the opinion that the law must follow nature—that the law must never throttle nature. And he adorned the Prussian code by that humane, sensible and sane paragraph: "Incompatibility of temper is sufficient cause for divorce."

The same law prevails in several American States—the new German code doesn't recognise it. What will be the consequence in Germany, what is the consequence in the State of New York, for instance? Men and women have to become moral felons before they can hope to extricate themselves from an intolerable and unworthy position. And think of the poor children suffering under the lash of their parents' discontentedness or hatred!

Under these circumstances man calculates that if he remains a bachelor he will never be so happy as if married, but, on the other hand, that he can never be so unhappy as when indissolubly joined to an unloved or otherwise undesirable woman.

As a matter of fact, the true philosopher seldom marries. Descartes, Spinoza, Leibnitz, Kant were bachelors, Democritus married a dwarf of a woman, as he preferred his trouble in homoeopathic doses. Every child pities Socrates.

Instead of making divorce laws more stringent, as the Germans have done, abolish those conditions that generate crime, if not for the sake of "guilty" men and women, do it for the sake of innocent children!

When Fools Fall Out—

"Brann's Iconoclast."

A subscriber has sent us a clipping from a newspaper giving an account of a fatal duel between a preacher and a lawyer at Williamson, W. Va., and he says, in an inclosed note: "Here is an excellent chance for you to get in some of your good work against the 'Knights of the Cloth' who are invariably getting themselves shot, owing to their inability to let other men's business and families alone."

Let's see about it. Newspaper reports of tragedies are not always trustworthy, yet in this case the newspaper statement is all we have on which to base our judgment. The Rev. John H. Wokl preached a rabid sermon in denunciation of dancing. If such a sermon affords a preacher any satisfaction we say, in the name of free speech, let him have full swing. But this particular sermon angered Lawyer A. Davis Stokes, who had previously been a warm friend of the preacher. From being a warm friend he became a hot foe. Stokes was a society leader and he felt called on to rebuke the preacher. A very silly thing to do. He should have either ignored the dominie's vaporings or laughed at him and told him it was "hot stuff." But Mr. Stokes tried to intimidate the preacher. A pistol fight followed. The preacher was instantly killed and Stokes, the lawyer, was dangerously wounded. According to the newspaper account, the parson was the aggressor and he fired the first shot. In this particular instance it would be unfair to put all the blame on the preacher. It was the lawyer, whose legal training ought to have taught him better, who went out of his way to look for trouble. He showed himself to be as asinine a meddler with other people's affairs as did the choreophoble ecclesiast.

Care of Health.

Exchange.

Our great annual plague of colds is in full swing. Almost everybody is either about to have, or has, or is just recovering from a cold. Cold-cures are selling by the ton. The druggists and the doctors and the undertakers are reaping a rich harvest.

There are three main causes of this plague:

First—Indigestion from overeating and rapid eating.

Second—Too heavy clothing.

Third—Overheated houses.

A human being who is always shoveling in another meal upon the still undigested preceding meal is always in condition to catch anything that may be going. As the cold is the easiest thing to catch, all these overeaters have colds.

We dress for the house as if we lived outdoors—especially the men. The average man, sitting in his office or at home, with the temperature higher than it would be on a Summer day, has on a thick winter suit and a thick suit of underwear—enough covering adequately to protect him if he were walking about briskly in the open air on a bitter winter day. The women are more sensible in this respect, hence their greater freedom from colds.

Our houses are heated with an almost poisonous dry heat to a point that makes the skin shrivel and crack.

Do you notice your furniture, how it dries out and falls to pieces? Yet American furniture is especially seasoned and put together with a particular kind of glue with a view to meeting the American conditions of fierce dry heat.

If the furniture can't stand this heat, what must be its effect upon the body?

Living rooms that are chilly are not healthful. But they are less unhealthful than living rooms that are filled with hot, dry, stale air.

If you wish to avoid colds you must avoid the cause of colds.

There is no such thing as prejudice in nature. The free wind laughs as it listens to our liturgies. The sun looks down upon our synods and conventions with pitying amusement, and remembers thousands of similar ones in distant lands and forgotten ages. Look at the vast star-lit sky on a calm evening, and ask yourself what do those infinite spaces know of our little alley-ways of belief. A cobble-stone seems a mountain to a tiny ant, and Calvary seems an important hill to a tiny Christian; but what do they think about it on Mars?—Casson.

VARIOUS VOICES.

L. A. DuBois, U. S. Arsenal, New York:—I enclose $1 for renewal of my subscription, and necessary stamps for "The New Hedonism," and "The Education of the Feminine Will." There are a good many kinds of cranks in the world, and I am one of the kind who believe that every person should think and act for himself under the guidance of his past experience without reference to what others may do, or proclaim to be right or wrong.

Mrs. Smith, 618 Detroit St., Cleveland, O.:—In a copy of your paper for Dec. 23, I see that A. W., St. Charles, Ill., desires to adopt a boy. If he will write to Mrs. M. Ginnis, 17th Ave. between Pearle and Logan, Denver, Colo., Superintendent of Homes for Children, he will only be required to give references as to means and habits (drinking). This institution boards children around in different homes until an "adopted" parent can be found.

P. H. Pauley, Weymouth Bridge, N. S.:—Yes, I am pleased with the little paper and when I have read it I send it (generally) over to England—I was born there. You have no doubt noticed that the old things are passing away in my native land, of which I am very glad. They are slow, but sure, and a good thing too. I do wish some one over there would rise up and convince them that to be all the time running about with a gun and a knife is by no means a nob'e thing to do. I have travelled much and have seen more misery, sorrow, suffering and tears in England than in any country I have ever visited.

Nancy G. Bartlett, Beloit, Wis.:—I write to request you most earnestly, to refrain from ever again sending your paper to my address. I wish to protect the sanctity of my home from the intrusion of any such misleading deleterious doctrine as that teaches. Surely, if it is a light-bringer, it is a false light, the light of Satan that has lured poor fallen humanity on to its own destruction ever since they turned from following the Lord and his commandments, and followed instead, their own desires. Poor perverted humanity needs all possible barriers thrown around it, rather than have them all thrown down. I cannot conceive of a worse pandemonium than would exist if your theory were carried into practice. No matter how many send you my name do not again send me that perfidious paper.

[The above is printed as a specimen of the response we sometimes get from those to whom specimen copies of Lucifer are sent. Of course we never knowingly send a second sample in a case like this, but once in awhile a repetition of the "offence" will happen. In Kansas a Lutheran minister testified in court that he had been "persecuted" by sample copies of Lucifer, and in this city of Chicago, as I am credibly informed, the lecturer, that is, the regular pastor or minister of the "Chicago Liberal Society," from his "freethought" pulpit in a recent Sunday discourse, took occasion to warn his hearers against a paper called Lucifer, saying that he hoped no more copies would be sent to him, and that he considered it unfit to be seen or read in any self-respecting household, or words to that effect. M. H.]

Edward Stern, Phila., Pa.:—Coming back to Koresh. Where can I find the best refutation of his astronomical developments? Have scientists ever attempted to project a straight line upon the earth's surface? Have any scientists ever made adequate reply to the geodetic work of the Koreshans? Is it or is it not a fact, that after a ship's hull is hidden by the curve in the earth's surface, that a powerful telescope will bring it back into view again? Even if we live on the inside of a hollow sphere it does not follow that Koresh is correct in his revelations regarding all things seen and unseen, but I have an object in asking these questions. Have greatest respect for Truth, but teaching a fact which is not a fact as a proof that a certain thing is true sits illy upon my stomach. Have long ago decided not to send our children to public schools as I do not perceive the utility or desirability of the vicious cramming system there in vogue. If I cannot afford to select a school or found one for them and other children would rather educate them myself in the evenings. Teach them to perceive, to think, to write, to figure, to read, to see the wonderful mystery all around about us. You will understand I am for valid reasons seeking whatever light I can secure upon this important subject of direct proof of the earth's form. What I want is proof, or proofs, not theories. Enclose you stamps and would ask that you kindly forward the following books or pamphlets: "The New Hedonism," Grant Allen, "What the Young Need to Know," Walker, 10; "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs," Dawson, 20; "The Education of the Feminine Will," Harlor, 3; "The Sanctity of Marriage," Greer, 10.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jean-nette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents.

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages, 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages. 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Paper covers 50 cents, Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul, "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

Love in Freedom,

By M. HARMAN.

THE EDUCATION OF THE FEMININE WILL.

BY MLLE. HARLOR.

"To be able to reason and to have pride is superfluous for one who has only to obey. . . . Reason is the liberator of conscience"—p. 7.

"Not only is it necessary to claim economic emancipation; it is necessary to preach moral emancipation at the same time and with equal fervor. It must be said that the first without the second would be three-quarters barren, and that the decisive revolution is the inward revolution. . . . Resignation the perpetual avowal of impotency."—pp. 9, 11.

A wonderfully clear and strong exposition of the demands of awakened womanhood—by a self-reliant, self-respecting woman.

Price three cents each; per dozen for distribution twenty five cents.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. Liberty the Chief Factor in Progress.

BY C. L. JAMES.

The nineteenth century was doubtless a wonderful era. Let us hope the twentieth will be more wonderful and better. It won't, however, unless we cultivate those methods which made the nineteenth century superior to others and avoid those errors which have deeply tarnished her record. And this we are little likely to do unless we can discriminate between the improving methods and the errors.

The chief glory of the nineteenth century is the immense advance in what is variously called "science," "knowledge of nature," "the positive philosophy," "the inductive," or the "modern Baconian," method, etc., and which may be defined as the study which teaches by observation and experiment how objects palpable to sense can be modified. This study requires freedom. It is the deadly enemy of Humbug, whereof tyranny is the Siamese twin. Tyranny, therefore, never fails to fall out with science, and if possible to crush it. But the spirit which dare resist tyranny, as it must be resisted if it is not to succeed, springs only from devotion to the subjective rule of conscience. Whatever weakens that law, undermines the foundation of liberty and the superstructure of science. A philosophy which repudiates conscience, and refers the rule of life vaguely to "self-interest," or still more hazily to "the greatest good of the greatest number," is, accordingly, no kin to the Baconian. Such a philosophy has been much preached all through the nineteenth century, and, what makes it the more mischievous, by persons who represented themselves as Baconians.

The Baconian method reacts in favor of liberty and conscience by constantly furnishing new proofs that things contrary to liberty, (which conscience always condemned), belong to the humbug not the "positive" phase of thought—in Aristotelian phraseology that they spring from the volition to persuade, not from the volition to Make. Thus it proved, during the nineteenth century, that slavery, serfdom, government by kings and aristocracies, are unfavorable to industrial and commercial progress. It has not yet convinced a great many who conceive themselves Baconians that tariffs, wars of conquest, penal legislation, and other legislation, all condemned by "justice" (the law of liberty) and humanity (the law of conscience), are hostile to industrial and commercial progress, though this is equally true.

The humbug method still persuades many who know something of the Baconian, that statutes against child-labor are or can be enforced. The Baconian method teaches that child-labor, like all trade, is regulated by a natural economic law, that the demand for it is essentially a demand for bread, and that the supply cannot be prevented from meeting the demand till this is cut off by removing such factitious obstacles to bread-winning as landlordism and capitalism.

The humbug method still persuades many not quite ignorant of the other, that "the criminal law, instead of being too rigorous, is in many matters a good deal too mild." So it was pronounced, for exactly the same reasons, when it was most cruel. The Baconian method, as cultivated by Lombroso, Havelock Ellis, and their school, teaches that punishment for crime is unmixedly mischievous; that criminals divide into curables and incurables; that each of these divide into dangerous and not dangerous; that the alternative to killing dangerous incurables is simply locking them up for life; that dangerous curables are bettered by detection and warning, but made worse by punishment; that the non-dangerous, curable or incurable, should be let alone.

The humbug method leads many who know something of the other, to boast that such things as ten or twelve years imprisonment for such acts as attacking slavery in print have become inconceivable outside of such countries as Russia. The Baconian method must recognize such a fact as that in America any publisher may be sent to prison for a time virtually indefinite by simply calling something he has published obscene, under laws which enable anything to be called obscene.

The humbug method boasts exceedingly that the State and private charity have established schools both for common and higher education. The Baconian method will not forget that both the State and private agencies of education have been roped in by the Movement in Favor of Ignorance—that in New York, our richest city, school facilities are steadily running further behind school population; that the Carnegies openly discourage higher education as unfavorable to "business success," that the Stanfords and Rockefellers take care their colleges shall teach humbug, not science; that these facts excite a prejudice against higher education even among radicals themselves too ignorant to discriminate; that wherever the Catholics are able to maintain such schools as they need, the district schools are burnt till the Protestants get sick of rebuilding! Let us hope that Squeers and Bumble do really belong to the past. I have read many an advertisement of twenty-pounds schools in the "Times;" and as for poorhouses—ah! Humbug is great.

It is true that "scourges, smallpox, cholera and the plague," with many others, have been almost extirpated. It is true, for example, that within twenty years the mortality after amputation has been reduced from twenty or thirty per cent to two, while operations formerly impossible have been made daily preservers of life. Pain, too, even more than death the terror of our supersensitive age, the angel of anæsthesia has under foot. It is interesting to inquire how theses advantages were attained.

They were attained, and could only have been attained, by vivisection, operating mainly along the line of bacteriology. To describe the movement against vivisection as "displaying a zeal not altogether according to knowledge" is, therefore, showing Humbug very unnecessary delicacy. The movement indicated is without any qualification a phase of the Movement in Favor of Ignorance, sustained, of course, by all the "grannies," but inspired (no less of course) by the hygienic quacks, whose trade the progress of medical knowledge undermines; and, like all phases of the Movement in Favor of Ignorance, by the Catholic priests. As this matter has been aired a little lately, it may be worth while to notice that the utterly humbugging character of the movement is attested by two lies which it never fails to tell. These are that bacteriologists represent their therapeutics as infallible, and that "people keep on dying in the same old-fashioned way."

R. B. Kerr shall be my witness against lie No. 2. For lie No. 1—I remarked the other day one of its disseminators said that science had recently proved the world to be shaped like a five-cent loaf! The statements go admirably together, and certainly will hurt only their utterers. But that such statements can be made in the year 1900 A. D., should teach us to repent, not boast.*

I am glad that the law of England gives a man no power over his wife, and I wish I could say as much for the law of America. But woman will not be free till her mind is. And then she will think twice about such sweeping assertions as that "among those old advocates of freedom in sex relations who have practiced their ideal to the fullest extent, a correspondingly great dissatisfaction and disappointment is arising." As to woman's property, they have only recovered lost ground. They never were so free, either sexually or financially, as under the pagan Roman Empire. That they begin bidding fair to advance further, explains the existence of a Movement in Favor of Ignorance.

In some respects the Roman Empire is less entitled to praise. It did things very like what Glasgow is doing for the poor. It supplied free bread, like "some French municipalities." It socialized the means of travel and communication, like Switzerland, and, to a less extent, other modern countries. It boasted louder and more justly than the priests or the Czar of having put an end to war. This was humbug. So long as those who care only for their own material comfort can be supplied by "papa government" with "bread and shows," they will endure compulsory arbitration. And they can, until papa government becomes bankrupt, as he did in the Roman Empire. But the Baconian method teaches that of his essentially self-consuming economy this is the inevitable end. The only hope of permanent progress lies in his being found out and shown the door.

*The feeling against cruelty to animals is undoubtedly a fruit of science. But the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals is a parasite of the humbug kind, which has fastened upon this feeling. It proves its character by always demanding "more laws." Whatever time it can save from attacking the medical art, and "disposing" of stray dogs with carbonic oxide, it devotes to confiscating poor men's beasts and shooting them. It ought to be called the the Society for the Promotion of Cruelty to the Sick and Poor.

Better-Born Children.

BY P. L. AVERY.

The grandest and holiest of creative functions; one that should entitle her to the highest honor and reverence from man—maternity, woman has accepted as a curse.

Ever since the episode of the apple in the garden woman has taken her place as the slave to man's desires, to minister to his wants, too often yielding her body a living sacrifice to his passions; covering all the woes, miseries and heart-breaking agony of unwilling motherhood and unwelcome children, by the sanctity of the marriage vow.

Too long has she borne all this with sealed lips, but out from the struggle and strangle of these miseries endured for ages are being born the women who will demand, and demanding obtain, the ownership of their own bodies, claiming as theirs alone the right to determine who shall be the father of the child she desires to bear.

Not alone from the criminal classes are born the unhappy ones who fill our jails, penitentiaries and reformatories. Unwelcome maternity enforced again and again upon the helpless woman too often drives her to desperation, in thought, at least, and that thought finds expression in offspring whose career causes friends and acquaintances to wonder why the children of such parents should turn out so badly.

No doubt these parents are good people—according to law! The father a "model man" (male would be a better word), pious, a pillar in his church, upright in business, stern to all offenders, yet hesitating not to offer upon the altar of his animal passions all that was tender, sweet and loving in the patient, long-suffering wife.

Was she not his property? to be used as he pleased? Had he not got a legal permit? Had not the priest sanctioned and blessed and given the certificate (deed)? Did not she, too, feel this to be true? And how far do the laws in many states today fall short of this idea?

Can we expect a child born under circumstances such as these to escape the natural inheritance, the blight of prenatal influences that surrounded it before birth?

Back of maternity and co-equal with it is the love which prompts to the creation of a new being through sex action; the true spiritual attraction, the soul affinity of the parents whose physical bodies, earthy in material, have given birth to a life that may rise to the highest plane of intellectual and spiritual attainment, claiming immortality as its just inheritance.

For death, as a cessation of being, is being fast relegated to the grave-yard of exploded theories, along with the personal god idea and other such old time illusions which have no basis except the ignorance of an infant race.

This love brings only desired children into the world, welcomes their birth and will put forth every effort possible to so assist and guide the child's development as will enable it at maturity to enter the arena of life well equipped for the struggle. Every faculty of mind, every muscle and nerve of the body is trained by regular and systematic exercise to make the individual complete master of self and conscious of such mastery.

Why do mankind, with rare exceptions, regard this love as unclean? Why should the function that leads to parenthood, and the parts of the body more immediately concerned therein be mentioned only in private or in coarse jest?

Why should nude figures be hidden from sight, no matter how pure and lofty the ideals they seek to express?

In the beginning it was not so. From time immemorial the race has bowed the head in reverent adoration at the shrine of the creative forces, as typed by gods and man.

The earth itself is always spoken of as the mother, and ever referred to as feminine.

To the people who enjoyed the newness of life when the race was young, all that which now shocks our prudes and menders of morals of the Comstock school, were held as sacred types, symbolical of the deepest religious meaning. Representations of the masculine and feminine organs of sex being used as symbols of the creative power. These ideas were so ingrained in the inner nature, the bone and the flesh of the race that these emblems, revered by the sex-worshipers of old, are still used and adored by millions of the Christianized world today, while not one in a thousand knows aught of their origin or real religious meaning.

How much, think you, does the devout Sister of Mercy dream of the true significance of the cross she so humbly raises to her lips? Little thinks the average Christian as he gazes at some beautiful and lofty spire pointing heavenward like the finger of faith, that it, too, is of pagan origin; an emblem from the old Phallic worship once common to all the races of men, and of which traces exist even now.

Yet this good Christian is shocked when he picks up a magazine devoted to physical culture, and which has not from cover to cover even an immoral suggestion, and begs the editor to exclude all nude figures from its pages, or else he must drop it, and this prudish purist backs up his request with the names of ninety-two more members. They fear this magazine will prove demoralizing to young readers. Oh, ye poor ignorant mortals, when will you so cleanse your own hearts that the sight of a nude figure, either alive or copied, will awaken only feelings of admiration and thankfulness that you belong to a branch of the animal kingdom capable of development to such beauty and perfection. And when will you learn to mind your own business and not interfere with the liberty of others? Learn now, if you never knew it before, that the asceticism cultivated by Christianity in its early days stamped the beautiful human body as unclean, and the female form divine as the image of Satan, a special temptation straight from hell.

Go back to the middle ages and learn what sort of progeny this celibate asceticism bred and what its results upon humanity. Then, if you still cling to your inherited ideas of modesty and purity, put pants on your horse, skirts on the cow, and cover up every natural object that reproduces after its kind, for among them all man, civilized man, alone wears clothes.

I shall never forget the glad eagerness with which a young girl ran from my side as we were passing through the Boston Public Library, to a statue of Venus, nor how intently she looked at it, passing her hand lovingly over it and turning to me exclaimed:

"Oh, I am so glad to have seen this! Is it really the Venus we read of as the model of beauty? Why, she has a large waist and full round abdomen, and I have been laughed at all my life because of my large waist and made to wear corsets and told not to take deep breaths lest it would make my waist large." This from a girl who never had a prudish or an immoral idea in her head. She saw in the nude figures only their divine beauty and perfection of form.

It seems to me that here lies the work of the present. To cultivate, to educate; to show that sound bodies with sound minds are needed to produce the higher type of humanity we seek. physical culture for the bodies, mental culture for the intellect. For no matter how great the mental attraction, or how strong and pure the mutual affection between two, they fall short of the perfection they might reach by just so much as their bodies fail of reaching a perfect physical development.

Lucifer is engaged in a grand work; one which should enlist the earnest support of all thinking people; how to best accomplish its work is a problem very difficult to solve, under our present social conditions. Yet we should feel hopeful and confident of ultimate success in the future when we trace man's upward climb from protoplasm to the status of the race now beginning the twentieth century.

About a Book.

BY KATE AUSTIN.

"Dawn Thought, a Glimpse of a Larger Religion," is a new book from the pen of J. Wm. Lloyd, the well-known author of "Wind Harp Songs," "The Red Heart in a White World" and editor of "The Free Comrade."

"Dawn Thought" is a very human book, human in its virtues, human in its faults, and through it all runs, like a living stream, the sincerity of the author. Men and women who have cast off mind-dwarfing creeds of a brutal theology, yet cling steadfastly to the hope of immortality and the idea of a great and loving Intelligence somewhere in the wide waste of worlds upon worlds without end, will find ample room to expand in the vast field of speculation aroused by this book.

The religions of the old days were based upon miracles, those of a later generation upon assumption, and Comrade Lloyd's "Larger Religion" has its due share of the common failing, an uncertain premise.

"Dawn Thought" was born of Pantheism. The basic idea is this: The Universe is God; there is a center of intelligence, force and love, this center bearing the same relation to the whole universe as the mind does to our body; that there are two aspects of the Divine—gods, in the personal sense, as the essence or fountainhead, and God in the pantheistic sense, as the "All in All." Around this assumption, the reasonableness of which each individual must decide for him or herself, Comrade Lloyd has grouped a multitude of ideas pertaining to immortality and human welfare.

The main thought of the book is that we should build on the "sure foundations of eternal nature" and that the first essential of practical right is the recognition of our "unity with every man," and of his equal liberty, and just as individuals recognize this truth, so fast will true progress come to culminate in human solidarity when men will no longer war with each other, but will "carry on industrial campaigns over lower nature, and spiritual battles within now undreamed of."

In regard to the love relations of the sexes the author speaks in no uncertain terms, as the following excerpts will show. "A woman's first duty, after keeping her own self-respect, is to her child; her body is her temple, she is sole priestess there. To invade her freedom is to strike at the moral life, hence all laws that interfere with a woman's sovereign choice of the man and the home and the right to divorce herself and child from any man, is the greatest of organized crimes."

It is impossible in a limited space to give a just estimate of this work of one of the truest reformers of our day. From the point of view of the new thought movement it ought to receive a warm welcome.

From the standpoint of revolutionary materialism it is open to severe criticism. Yet even from this point of view it cannot be denied that the book is productive of profound thought, and that it has a tendency to widen ones mental horizon, and this latter fact is the best thing I can say for "Dawn Thought." Read it for yourself and as the author says "look with your eyes" and I will add, see that reason's lamps are lit behind them.

Industrial Slavery—An Object Lesson

The recently deceased multi-millionaire, P. D. Armour, is chiefly responsible for the organization of the great meat-packing industries of the country. That much can be said in favor of what is called the improved methods of handling and slaughtering animals designed for food is doubtless true, but there are other sides to this question. Monopoly of the killing and packing business puts it in the power of a man or company of men to make abject slaves of the employes. Quoting from an exchange, here is a picture, drawn to life, of the way a large meat-packing establishment does business:

To gain an idea of the hold these great institutions have upon the life of the city, one should visit the neighborhood before seven o'clock in the morning, and standing upon one of the viaducts, witness the gathering of the throng of laborers. By every avenue of approach and from every direction, one sees an army of thousands, of all ages, from the trembling grey-haired old man, hobbling along on his stick, to the young urchins, who would be studying the primer if they were in school where they belong. And among the rest area sprinkling of girls and women, and every one bent upon gaining his or her particular niche in the temple of Moloch before the whistle blows, for to be late is to lose a part of the already meager price for which they have sold themselves.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

The sound of sympathy once passed my door,
And with the hush I first knew discontent;
So must the parched meadow thirst the more,
When the cool shadow of a cloud is spent.

The Marriage Problem.

As never before perhaps in the history of mankind the problem of marriage is up for discussion. As mentioned in a recent issue of this journal, the editor of the "Chicago American" has invited such of his readers as "may care to discuss this very serious problem" to send him their views. Elsewhere in the same article he says the "notion [that our present marriage law is not sensible] appears to be growing constantly. It is one which has suggested itself to people more or less frequently since the beginning of marriage. All our institutions are changing constantly and marriage, perhaps, need not be an exception to the rule, etc.

One of the first to accept the invitation extended by the "American" was Dr. Juliet H. Severance, well known to many of our readers as a writer and lecturer on reform subjects, and especially upon the subject of the right relations of the sexes. Her debate on this question with the editor of "The Olive Branch" was published in pamphlet form, and has been very widely circulated and read. Her address entitled "Marriage a Failure," delivered before the International Congress of Freethinkers held in Chicago during the World's Fair, received much applause from that distinguished body of women and men.

The letter of Dr. Severance, published in the "Chicago American" of January 22 reads as follows:

We can never expect the best results in any direction in the conjugal relation so long as the parties so related hold the relative position of master and subject—as they now do in our marriage system.

Our marriage codes are based upon our religious theories, which teach that woman was an after-thought of the Creator, who recognizing man's great need of a helpmeet, created her for his special benefit. Before the conjugal relations of the race are what they should be woman must be recognized as co-equal with man in rights, privileges and responsibilities, with no feeling of personal ownership in the minds of either.

Short-sighted man does not recognize the fact that where there is one slave there are always two—the one who wears the fetters and the one who forges them—and that freedom is the only foundation for any relation in life at all desirable. The entire nomenclature of marriage confirms the principle of ownership by the husband of the wife, and her dependence and subjection.

"Coverture" an eminent law writer defines as signifying that the very being of the wife is merged in that of her husband. "Dower" is not property that belongs to the wife or widow as an inherent right, but that which the law endows her with out of her husband's estate for her maintenance, just as in Southern slavery masters were compelled by law to provide for old and worn-out slaves. "Obey," used in marriage ceremonies is the the very essence of slavery when required of mature years and judgment.

Love is the only sanctifying element in conjugal union, and if from any cause love should cease the relation should also cease.

Our marriage system is based upon law, not upon love, and makes the stupid blunder of demanding a promise to love for life, as though love was an act of volition, when the fact is love is involuntary. We can no more love and honor a person by a mere volition of the will than we can make a world out of nothing.

This sentiment is awakened in us by the conduct and character of others, not by any effort of our own.

We love that which appears to us as lovable and hate that which is hateful. We honor that which is honorable and despise that which is despicable. Whoever promises to love and honor another for life promises that which he may be wholly unable to perform. If he could be sure he knew perfectly the person, and that said person would never change, and that he himself would remain just the same, it might be done safely; but this is impossible, for change is the order of nature.

Then, with mutual love as its basis, a contract to live together on such terms as the contracting parties may elect, dissoluble at the will of the contracting parties, would be the only just form of conjugal relations of an enlightened and free people.

In this week's issue of Lucifer will be found the letter of a correspondent entitled "Conditional Marriage," in which the writer recommends, for those wishing to marry, a period of probation or trial, before assuming the risks and responsibilities of marriage properly so considered. She does not tell us what is to become of the child that may result from the trial trip in the matrimonial boat—that is, whether it is to belong wholly to the mother, or whether the father should be held to a share of responsibility for the support and education thereof.

Another feature—one of still greater importance, perhaps, of the plan proposed by E. L. R., is that of requiring the candidates for matrimony to "go before the proper authorities and get out papers setting forth their intentions," etc. These papers, presumably, would be in the nature of a written "license," or permission to assume the marriage relation for a limited or specified number of months. Certain requirements as to age, degree of kinship, consent of parents, etc., would naturally have to be met before the papers referred to would be granted, and for which a legal fee would be exacted.

That there would arise many objections to this as well as other features of our friend's plan, goes without saying. Some of us think we have entirely too much law now—too much legal meddling with the private and personal affairs of grown-up women and men. All who think thus would strenuously object to the multiplication of laws regarding marriage.

As a partial reply to the well-meant suggestion of E. L. R. demanding an addition to our present marriage laws we here quote a few paragraphs from another late editorial in the "Chicago American:"

The State of Wisconsin, following many precedents, is now endeavoring to improve the human race by regulating marriage.

A Board of Physicians, including a woman when possible, must pass upon all candidates for matrimony. Drunkards and those with a tendency to insanity must not be permitted to marry, and thus the race in Wisconsin shall improve at once.

Legislation of this sort nearly always arouses admiration on superficial examination. BUT—

It is harmful in the first place and useless in the second. It is harmful because forbidding marriage simply means adding an incentive to vice. Forbidding marriage among those inclined to viciousness makes of vice a certainty.

It is useless because the enormous task of improving the human race is not left to the Legislature of Wisconsin or to any other earthly agency.

This task the great Wisdom of Nature itself has never delegated, or neglected, or forgotten for a second. . . .

And it is not chiefly on the destruction of the unfit that wise Nature relies. Her eternal hope is in "natural selection." . . . .

The Legislators of Wisconsin mean well in their marriage regulations. But if they will look closely into the matter, studying it for about ten years, they will find that Nature has made such plans for improving the human race as cannot be improved upon by earthly legislation.

If the "eternal hope of nature is in natural selection" rather than in the destruction of the unfit, why does not the "American" come out plainly and consistently for the abolition of ALL laws now on the statute books that defeat natural selection?

What would there be left of legal marriage and divorce if this were done?

If nature's plans for improving the human race cannot be improved upon by earthly legislation, how can this editor logically support our present very complex and very expensive legislation regulating the marital relations of men and women?

As some of us see it the "Chicago American" is doing a deal of iconoclastic work by SUGGESTION, notwithstanding the glaring inconsistencies of its positions.

As an object lesson of much value—to close this series of quotations relating to the marriage problem, we herewith insert from an exchange the following very suggestive paragraphs:

Two years ago Paris was convulsed with excitement during the sensational trial of Mrs. Paoli, a wealthy woman of fashion who was convicted of administering powdered glass and arsenic to her husband, a well known painter. The couple had been divorced, but had remarried.

Now, the husband being out of the hospital and the wife pardoned for the rest of her ten years' sentence, Paoli wants to marry for the third time the woman who did her best to murder him. This last courtship has been lasting three months, during which both behaved like madly infatuated lovers, but Mme. Paoli having announced her intention to marry another suitor, her former husband threatens to shoot her if she does. She now applies to the police for protection.

The central idea of marriage—canon law marriage—the idea around which the whole body of marriage and divorce laws is built, is that of especially the ownership of woman by man. Here we have a couple who are, by turns, magnetically attractive and repellant to each other, and who, if left free to come together and separate as often as they chose without the sense of exclusive ownership that legal marriage fosters if not compels, would never think of killing each other because the love bond was not strong enough to ensure exclusive, life-long union.

As if to show how the leaven is working the "Chicago Inter-Ocean" prints, in its issue of Jan. 30, a report of a meeting of the woman's branch of the Society for Ethical Culture, at which meeting the principal address appears to have been one upon marriage and divorce, by Mrs. Corinne S. Brown. The report begins with these words:

"A new man has been growing up with the new woman, and a revolution in the marriage ceremony is likely to follow."

Quoting Mrs. Brown the report proceeds:

This new man today admires and loves the woman who says: "Yes, I love you now and will marry you, but if in ten years we do not care for each other—if I do not care for you—we will separate; do you understand?' and the new man will say: "I do; I think you are quite right."

Many women want their economic freedom, and if they had it there would be an alarming dissolution of marriages. These are the reasons they cannot have it now: They cannot provide for themselves; they cannot support their children, pay their bills and send them to school. The sort of an understanding these new young men and women have today regarding marriage, the existence of the marriage tie only so long as it is agreeable to both, will pave the way for the economic and personal freedom of women.

Thus it is seen that Mrs. Brown makes the marriage reform the fundamental or basic reform. It will pave the way for the economic and personal freedom of women, and freedom of women, the mothers of the race, means freedom for man as well as woman. M. H.

Sexual Physiology in the Schools.

The following clipped from an exchange is self-explanatory:

Yesterday afternoon at Pilgrim Hall about twenty-five citizens of Boston, most of them women, listened to a paper by Dr. L. Gibbons, of Jamacia Plain, on the instruction of sexual physiology in the public schools, and then decided unanimously that such instruction should be given, especially in the first grammar grade. The following resolution was adopted, and will be sent into the School Board:

That, Whereas the intelligence of the community demands that a more extended instruction in physiology relating to the sexual development of the child be taught in the public schools of the city, it is the sense or this meeting that the Boston Public School Board adopt such instruction in the graduating classes in the public schools with a view to bringing this knowledge before boys and girls ranging from fourteen to sixteen years.

The meeting was called by Mary T. Whitney, President Moral Education Society, Catherine L. Stevenson, President W. C. T. U., and Dr. Salome Merritt, President Ladies Physiological Institute.

We copy the above statement from the "Evening Record," and wish to give this movement instigation by Dr. Gibbons our most hearty endorsement. It is high time that a knowledge of this kind be taught to the young ere they become victims of sexual indulgences ruinous to health, moral stamina and future conjugal happiness. We regard this as the most important educational endeavor that has been started for a long time, and most cordially lend our influence to its success.

A few weeks ago I had the privilege of listening to a lecture on the physiology and hygiene of sex, by Mrs. Fowler, widow of O. S. Fowler, at Central Music Hall in this city. This lecture was "to men only." It was illustrated by life size pictures of the organs of human reproduction, in health and also when mal-formed and distorted by disease and by bad habits of dress, etc. In a truthful and very powerful manner the lecturer warned her listeners, showing them how ignorance and ungoverned passion destroys the health and happiness of wives and causes them to become the mothers of imbeciles and criminals, defeating also the selfish enjoyment of the ignorant and recklessly irresponsible husband.

The silent comments upon this lecture took shape something after this fashion, in the mind of at least one of her hearers:

Why should such lectures be given to "men only," or to "women only"?

Why should not lessons like these constitute a large and necessary part of school education, so that the young of both sexes might know the dangers to which ignorance and passion will be sure to expose them?

Why should medical schools and colleges be allowed to monopolize this tremendously important branch or department of human knowledge?

As public instruction for the young is now managed a pupil may graduate from the common school, the grammar school or the so-called "high school" and yet not know that the physical organism of a girl differs from that of a boy. Is this right? Is it wise or sensible in the teacher or just to the pupil?

Conditional Marriages.

BY E. L. R.

Lucifer fell into my hands some little time ago. And I have been reading and thinking over its various discussions on the subjects of freedom in love and marriage, etc.

These are subjects in which I have long been interested. I thoroughly believe in the equality of the sexes. Woman as well as man should be master of her own body and free to live out her highest ideals of life.

The present marriage system is all wrong. I see but one remedy. Here it is, in a nut-shell.

Let a man and woman go before the proper authorities and get out papers setting forth their intentions to live together as husband and wife for six months. If at the end of that time they find they love each other and are suited and mated, each content and satisfied with the other, then they are to be married.

If during that time they have found out that they are not mated, and are not content and happy, let them separate without any disgrace or shame to either party.

Now that is my idea. I believe were such the law there would be fewer divorce cases, and more happy marriages. If each state had at least twenty-five good speakers who would spend their time lecturing on this momentous question the people would wake up to the necessity of having such laws put in force.

What is needed now is speakers and writers who are not afraid to express their honest convictions in regard to this matter. Urge parents to instill into their children's minds that they should not wed till they are thoroughly satisfied, by actual trial of several months, that the one they have chosen is suited or adapted to them.

Away with false modesty. The world has been cursed with it long enough. Away with chance conceptions, unwelcome children and enforced motherhood. O what slaves many poor women are to the beastly lust of their lords and owners! Many say they would rather submit than to quarrel with their husbands or to have them go elsewhere and it is such a disgrace to separate.

It is high time men were taught self-control and temperance in sexual indulgence, and the higher use of the sexual nature.

If women would throw off their yoke of bondage and assert their liberty, freedom, men would soon learn to conform to nature's law, and to that sweet grace of courtesy, and of deference and respect for others' feelings and desires. If our kind editor sees fit he can publish these rambling thoughts from the pen of one who has come up through the thickest of the fight, and is today rejoicing in the glorious freedom of mind and body, though by some she is counted an outcast on account of her assertion of self-ownership. If any timid bonded slave should read this, let me say to her. Be free!—free as God intended you to be. Be happy; seek congenial companionship; you will find it after awhile. All good things come to those who wait, and who hustle while waiting! You do not need to become a prostitute while you are seeking your own.

I wonder how many men prostitutes we have running around the world today. Nice fellows they are! Please pardon this digression.

O women, my sisters! When will you get out of your silly ignorance and helplessness and fear! What do you fear? The poor-house? Better that and be free.

"But what will become of my little children?"

Oh yes! I know. This is what hurts. But I say to you, better let the state care for them, if the father won't or can't. The parting with them is what hurts. But better do it, dear mothers, than to live in hell and keep on bringing more unwelcome children into the world.

No doubt some one will say, "you are writing too strong." Not a bit of it. I am fully convinced that more than one-half of our homes are modern hells, and one-fourth of the remainder are kept in peace by the deceit of the wife, feigning to be pleased when she is not.

A very few are happy marriages, no doubt, thank God! A few truly mated souls get together and then there is heaven on earth.

The Critic.

BY F. W.

Replying to Amy Linnett, in Lucifer 842: Theoretically I have no "flowers, books, theater-tickets," food, raiment or shelter to exchange for sex companionship. I will admit that in theory, I do not belong to the style of free lovers who say that because a woman is "good to a man," he should contribute to her economic needs.

With the same propriety with which my critic assumes that I am a man and possess so very many characteristics of injustice, may I not assume that she is a woman and belongs to the style of free lovers which I say I do not belong to?

"F. W.'s Ideal" works no injustice to woman—does not exclude children—and does not lack proper and equitable provision for their care and support. "Economic conditions" are just as good for woman as for man. "Associated homes" are impractical until woman first becomes economically independent, and qualified to follow other occupations than cooking and baby-tending.

The free lover ranks, need better and purer-minded men and women, and especially economically independent women.

The way to get these, is to raise them from infancy, in industrial boarding schools, where girls and boys alike are furnished industries, and given a share of the proceeds from the sale of their products (each separately) with which to procure their necessaries and luxuries, and to save. Where are the industrial capitalists—syndicates or monopolies that will establish and carry on such schools? Do not allow such capitalists, etc., to be killed until after such schools are in operation. A generation of women and men made up from boys and girls so raised will build and occupy "Associated Homes." "And the lion shall lie down with the lamb," etc.

VARIOUS VOICES.

J. P. M., Ashland, Wis.:—I have a sister in Nebraska who has just sued for divorce—the first separation in the history of the family. The world moves. Please advance my subscription a year for the enclosed dollar.

Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Va.:—If J. W. G., of Dallas, Texas, will write to J. F. Ruggles, Bronson, Michigan, he will hunt a copy of "Cupid Yokes" for him and charge but very little for doing so. It will take time—but he rarely fails in finding an "O. P." book, and charges nothing till he succeeds.

Santiago Walker, Monterey, Mexico:—I wish to say a friendly word about the situation you put us in by your last resume [Lucifer No. 844]. The present race won't reform, ergo the call is to what? To live only for the realization of a better future for others not yet created? It may be necessary to hold out some inducement to the living; a partial realization of some of our wishes for co-operation and companionship. This seems possible. A side reflection: The women who become very free and independent in mind will not increase the population so very much, hence this reform may after all prove to be somewhat apart from the general evolution, which is proceeding in a large way apparently to the impossibility of continuing the old forms of belief and the old order of society. I guess the offspring of enlightened women will average more capacity for leadership in the movements of the future, than others. At the same time I would draw your attention to the facts that free and genial men and women are found springing from parentage where there has been simply love without theory. But what I started to note was the apparent approach of a condition where it will not be necessary to ask people to submit merely to a doctrine and a hope for a future generation; but through the partial organization you could initiate they might form mutually helpful circles—in city and country—and should be havens for unperverted womanhood in which it may grow.

Pleased to see your New Year's resolve. My impression is that your daughter is exceedingly capable of editing Lucifer and will do everything well if she only has a reasonable amount of help. Were I in Chicago I would be willing to take some of the steady drudgery off your hands so you could devote yourself to your autobiography.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jean-nette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents

What The Young Need to Know: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover: 64 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Paper covers 50 cents, Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul, "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

Love in Freedom,

By M. HARMAN.

THE EDUCATION OF THE FEMININE WILL.

BY MLLE. HARLOR.

"To be able to reason and to have pride is superfluous for one who has only to obey, . . . Reason is the liberator of conscience"—p. 7.

"Not only is it necessary to claim economic emancipation; it is necessary to preach moral emancipation at the same time and with equal fervor. It must be said that the first without the second would be three-quarters barren, and that the decisive revolution is the inward revolution. . . . Resignation the perpetual avowal of impotency."—pp. 9, 11.

A wonderfully clear and strong exposition of the demands of awakened womanhood—by a self-reliant, self-respecting woman.

Price three cents each; per dozen for distribution twenty five cents.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., NO. 4. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, FEB. 9, E. M. 301. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE NO. 851.

Defense of the Pharisee.

Conscious of uprightness, the Pharisee
Stood in the Temple and in manly pride
Said, "I am thankful that, whate'er betide,
I shall maintain my soul's integrity."

Some call it Egotism: but to me
It seems no man can e'er be justified
When, knowing his own worth, he sets aside
His honest judgment for Hypocrisy.

The Publican who beats his breast and cries:
"Be merciful to me, a sinner, Lord!"
Either his manhood does not rightly prize,
Or seeks, with cringing and obsequious word,
To ape humility before men's eyes.

—Jonathan Mayo Crane.

Plain Words on the Woman Question.*

That the Woman Question includes the Man Question, or the human race question, is demonstrably true, since without women there would soon be no men.

Few people seem, however, to have a realizing sense of this fact. Even Grant Allen, who had so little veneration or respect for conventional ideas, did not appear to be fully aware of the fact that it is quite as absurd—if not more absurd—to speak of the woman question as something apart from the human question, or human race question, as it would be to speak of the man question as something apart from problems affecting the race as a whole.

Some one has said that motherhood is more intimately connected with, or controls, racial traits, permanent traits of character, whereas fatherhood gives the variations—the more temporary or exceptional traits. A more correct and comprehensive statement would be, since it is only through woman as mother that ANY traits, whether permanent or ephemeral, are stamped upon the race, or upon any individual member of the race.

In his essay of thirty-three pages, with the above title, Mr. Allen sets out with the statement that "if any species or race desires a continued existence, then above all things it is necessary that that species or race must go on reproducing itself."

This very self-evident statement is the keynote of the entire essay, the main purpose of which seems to be to show that our social reformers in their eagerness to free woman from slavery are in great danger of doing irreparable injury to the larger ego, the human race itself.

A few paragraphs from the pamphlet will give the reader a clearer idea of the author's trend and scope:

Here it is that we seem to come in conflict for a moment with most of the modern Woman-Question agitators. I say for a moment only, for I am not going to admit, even for that brief space of time, that the doctrine I wish to set forth here is one whit less advanced, one whit less radical, or one whit less emancipatory than the doctrine laid down by the most emancipated women. On the contrary, I feel sure that while women are crying for emancipation they really want to be left in slavery; and that it is only a few exceptional men, here and there in the world, who wish to see them fully and wholly enfranchised. And these men are not the ones who take the lead in so-called Women's Rights movements.

For what is the ideal that most of these modern women agitators set before them? Is it not clearly the ideal of an unsexed woman? Are they not always talking to us as though it were not the fact that most women must be wives and mothers? Do they not treat any reference to that fact as something ungenerous, ungentlemanly, and almost brutal? Do they not talk about our "casting their sex in their teeth"?—as though any man ever resented the imputation of manliness. Nay, have we not even many times lately heard those women who insist upon the essential womanliness of women denounced as "traitors to the cause of their sex"? Now, we men are (rightly) very jealous of our virility. We hold it a slight not to be borne that anyone should impugn our essential manhood. And we do well to be angry, for virility is the keynote to all that is best and most forcible in the masculine character. Women ought equally to glory in their femininity. A woman ought to be ashamed to say that she has no desire to become a wife and mother. Many such women there are, no doubt—it is to be feared, with our existing training, far too many; but instead of boasting of their sexlessness as a matter of pride, they ought to keep it dark, and to be ashamed of it—as ashamed as a man in a like predicament would be of his impotence. They ought to feel they have fallen short of the healthy instincts of their kind, instead of posing as in some sense the cream of the universe on the strength of what is really a functional aberration.

Unfortunately, however, just at the present moment, a considerable number of the ablest women have been misled into taking this unfeminine side, and becoming real "traitors to their sex" in so far as they endeavor to assimilate women to men in everything, and to put upon their shoulders, as a glory and privilege, the burden of their own support. Unfortunately, too, they have erected into an ideal what is really an unhappy necessity of the passing phase. They have set before them as an aim what ought to be regarded as a pis-aller [last resort]. And the reasons why they have done so are abundantly evident to anybody who takes a wide and extended view of the present crisis—for a crisis it undoubtedly is—in the position of women.

In the first place, the movement for the Higher Education of Women, in itself an excellent and most praiseworthy movement, has at first, almost of necessity, taken a wrong direction, which has entailed in the end much of the present uneasiness. Of course, nothing could well be worse than the so-called education of women forty or fifty years ago. Of course, nothing could be narrower than the view of their sex then prevalent as eternally predestined to suckle fools and chronicle small beer. But when need for some change was first felt, instead of reform taking a rational direction—instead of women being educated to suckle strong and intelligent children, and to order well a wholesome, beautiful, reasonable household,—the mistake was made of educating them like men—giving a like training for totally unlike functions. The result was that many women became unsexed in the process, and many others acquired a distaste, an unnatural distaste, for the functions which nature intended them to perform. At the present moment, a great majority of the ablest women are wholly dissatisfied with their own position as women, and with the position imposed by the facts of the case upon women generally; and this as the direct result of their false education. They have no real plan to propose for the future of women as a sex; but in a vague and formless way they protest inarticulately against the whole feminine function of women, often even going the length of talking as though the world could get along permanently without wives and mothers.

In the second place, a certain real lack of men to marry, here and now, in certain classes of society, and those the classes that lead thought, has made an exceptional number of able women at present husbandless and thus has added strength to the feeling that women must and ought to earn their own living. How small and local this cause is I shall hereafter try to show; but there can be no doubt that it has much to do with the present discontent among women. There is a feeling abroad that many women can't get married; and this feeling, bolstered up by erroneous statistics and misunderstood facts, has greatly induced women to erect into an ideal for all what is really a pis-aller for a small fraction of their body—self-supporting competition with men.

By reading the entire essay it will be seen that the author of "The British Barbarians" and other world-famous works uses the words marriage, wife, husband, etc., in no conventional sense. In the last paragraph of "Plain Words" he says, "Whether we have wives or not—and that is a minor point about which I, for one, am supremely unprejudiced—we must at least have mothers."

That is to say, Grant Allen has no prejudices against motherhood in freedom, or motherhood outside the legal marriage wall. No one who has read "The Woman Who Did" can accuse him of such prejudice, but that this distinguished English reform writer is always consistent with himself will scarcely be maintained even by his most ardent admirers. In the pages of the pamphlet devoted to the comments by E. C. Walker the following among other just reflections upon the essay are found:

Given sexual and social freedom, given to women the widest range of choice in the selection of co-parents, given a wise and comprehensive system of insurance to provide for the support and education of their children and the support of themselves during the periods when they cannot earn a livelihood, and given emancipation in spirit as well as in outward fact from the dominion of superstition, and there does not seem to be room for doubt that women will generally desire and seek motherhood, just as naturally and normally as sown wheat grows and matures and the flowers bloom amid the grass and in the garden. . . . . .

Grant Allen complained of the abandonment of maternity by the women of the cultivated classes, and yet demanded the universal support of women by men. Why did he fail to see this contradiction in his position? The women who are exempt from remunerative labor are the very ones who most shirk the labor of child-bearing, generally speaking. They, like the sons of rich fathers, lack the saving experience of the cost of comfort and luxury, just as they fail to realize the physical, mental, and moral benefits of work. Despite the fact that the women of the laboring classes are *over*worked, often, from them come the recruiting brain and brawn of the race. The goal we seek is the happy mean between their position and that of the women who are in great part or wholly supported by men. Among the latter are the daughters and other women of the wealthy, including the wives who have become such for homes and position, and the great unmarried prostitute class. All exist at the expense of men and in no part or all of them lies the hope of the race.

Every observing person knows what the men and women are who live upon the labor of others, how their dependence takes from them ambition and energy and the power of useful accomplishment. Only the very few can live down the curse of exemption from labor. Only the woman who is self-supporting is in a position to resist the temptation to enter the ranks of the prostitutes, unmarried or married. Only she can dictate her own terms in love. Better by far that two lovers earn between them the wages of one person than that one earn for both and dole it out to her as he deems proper. No matter if his judgment be ever so much better than hers, her position is humiliating. She will have better judgment only as she earns for herself.

And what is true of the woman and the individual man is likewise true of the woman and the collective man. A mutual maternity insurance association, as long ago suggested by Clarence Swartz, will secure a maximum of benefits with a minimum of costs, pecuniary and moral. The idea is perfectly practicable, and needs for its realization only the determination of a sufficient number of women who are resolved to be free in their love and in their motherhood. And their lovers would gladly combine with them for the sustenance and education of the children of liberty

As some of us see it, the "Woman Question"—and with it the question of human weal, human liberty, human progress, human civilization, will never be settled until we have free, intelligent and consciously responsible parenthood; especially, free, intelligent and consciously responsible MOTHERHOOD!

This is the basic reform; this the fundamental agitation that will, in time, bring a real desire for, and real capacity for, other reforms now so loudly and so earnestly and yet so vainly preached from thousands of platforms and pleaded for in thousands of books and in millions of daily, weekly and monthly journals.

Grant Allen is eminently in the right when he says that "while women are crying for emancipation they really want to be left in slavery." Women have not yet risen to the plane of desiring real financial independence—much less desiring real self-ownership of person, mind and soul. All they want is a good husband, a good father or brother, who will supply all their economic needs, and thus relieve them not only of industrial slavery but of all need of industrial effort.

These are the women who give birth to men who, while crying loudly for economic reform and equal right to nature's opportunities, show by their acts that they do not really desire economic freedom, economic justice, but simply a better adjustment of the present economic yoke to their necks!

Here, in a nutshell, we have the cold, the hard, the irrefutable facts, the underlying facts or factors, that puzzle our optimistic and enthusiastic workers in every field of reform, and especially of political and economic reform. The DESIRE itself for a real change, a real betterment in our political, economic and industrial systems has not yet come to the victims of our present systems, our unjust and enslaving systems, and this for the very simple but sufficient reason that the MOTHERS of men, the real builders of the race, have as yet no desire for change in our marital system—simply because, to again quote Grant Allen, "while crying for emancipation"—political and economic emancipation, women really want to be left in slavery"—the kind of slavery most deadly and deadening in its results, that which defeats progress through natural selection by binding body and soul of woman to an irrational, a superstitious, priest-begotten marriage code.

"Where there's a will there's a way"—but will is based on DESIRE; until there's a genuine desire there can be neither a will nor a way—out of the of political, economic, productive and reproductive—sexual—slavery.

Grant Allen's Error

Katharine Lockie, in "The Iconoclast"

In his short essay on "Plain Words on the Woman Question," Grant Allen appears to think that marriage and this subject are one and the same thing.

Perhaps it is, or at least should be. But Mr. Allen forgot one thing when he wrote upon that great subject—a subject of interest to every woman, whether she be radical or liberal, educated or ignorant, interested or indifferent, protected or unprotected, one which affects the world for all time to come. But it is a subject which should never be considered apart from the other half of the whole—man.

As great a thinker and writer as this Canadian proved himself to be before the light of his spirit went out must have written the little essay of "Plain Words," as he chose to call it, in his earlier days. In the first place, there are few plain words in the short paper recently published in the Light-Bearer Library, and none whatever "so brutal or unmanly" that Mr. Allen should feel an apology is necessary to certain "maiden ladies."

The wrongs of woman, this writer believes, can only be corrected, and her rights come to her, through marriage. To this theory Mr. Allen seems to think that the greater number of advanced women are opposed. Perhaps they are by voice and pen. The most of the writers on this subject, be they men or women, seem to agree. But the truth is that no woman ever lived, no matter how broad-minded or radical she was, who, in her heart of hearts, did not long for marriage and the protecting love of some man. Some man—not a man, or any man, but some one particular individual, whom she believes to be her realized ideal, and whom she longs to father her children.

Grant Allen, in these "Plain Words" on woman, insists over and over again that the solution of the question of the two is the coming together. But he does not go further and say that no coming together of the opposites will ever be complete until that coming is based on love, and love alone.

The maternal is left out of few women. Each one longs that eternity may be hers through the co-mingling of a love blood in posterity. But many a woman would rather that annihilation forever should come to her than that she should join her life in loveless wedlock. So she takes up her heavy burden and faces the future alone.

When Mr. Allen and the other great writers on the woman question consider that women do not want marriage, let them realize once for all that they do. Many may not care for a religious or legal ceremony, but the woman who proclaims she does not want completion with the other half speaks falsely.

Women long for the ideal and they wish it here in the real. In the heart of each is that ideal. The most of them have also seen it in some man, and often a very commonplace one at that, but he is the choice, and unless he and he alone can come to be the father of her children, that woman is true to herself and will have them fathered by none other.

It is not necessary to think from this that the proposition of marriage should come from the woman. That would not settle the question, for many a good and beautiful woman might be refused, as man for centuries has been. But let the scientific minds remember that when they see a woman bravely facing the world and the end alone, it does not especially mean that she does not believe in marriage. But, rather, that her children are not to be fathered by her choice, and that she will not sacrifice her love to the populating of the world, wherein Grant Allen seems to think lies her whole duty.

Love Versus Logic.

BY S. E. SHEPHERD.

It is not the preaching but the singing that brings down converts at revivals. Doctrinal argumentation is not in it. Logic is good (in its place) but love, emotion and social goodwill are better.

We debate, dispute and quarrel too much. We do too much intellectual slugging. Like Prof. Fitzsimmons and Dr. Jeffries, who are soon to meet in "joint debate" (in the ring) we are too pugnacious, too much on our intellectual muscle.

Men prate about their reason and yet the more they reason the further apart they get. Why should a strict adherence to the rules of logic lead men to diametrically opposite conclusions? Simply because "debate" is a fraud and humbug. It is of no more value than a last year's bird's nest with a hole in the bottom. Men weigh, measure, squint and reason but only hit the mark by accident. Woman with her little hatchet of intuition plunks the bull's eye every time. If the homing pigeons stopped to reason and debate about the direction, they would never find their way home.

I have a neighbor, a staunch liberal. He borrows my Lucifer. He is "sound on the goose." His wife and daughter are Christians. He goes with them to church. Of course he can argue them blind. So they compromise. He gets the argument; they get the turkey. Intellectually he is a liberal. Socially he is a Christian. So it goes. Liberalism gets the argument; the church gets the turkey.

I once asked a liberal friend which was of greatest value—love or truth. "Truth," he replied, "for truth is an eternal principle while love is only a fleeting passion." "You are wrong," said I, "for truth is not a human necessity and love is. I would not swap love for truth and all the world thrown in for boot."

Love's traducers say it is blind. Admit it. Love needs no eyes. Its intuitions are a better guide than reason with all its boasted sight. Love has a reason all its own, the reason of infinity. Love is innate, instinctive, persistent, cohesive, rhythmical, creative, infinite, divine. Reason is the opposite of all these—artificial, fallible, finite. It is the doubled distilled quintessence of discord. Whatever is sweet and beautiful and harmonious and enchanting and heavenly in life love makes it so.

Concrete truths make good seasoning for love but abstract truth is the bane of this world and always has been. It breeds dogmas, creeds and inquisitions. It rattles men's brains and transforms them into devils. Its councils lead down to death. Abstract truth be hanged. This is a concrete world, a concrete existence. Take your abstract truth and go to the devil with it but give me love and peace and good fellowship.

Let's quit arguing and hair-splitting and go to fiddling and dancing.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

A Record-Breaking Drama.

Since our last issue went to press a spectacular performance, show, drama—involving both the serious and the comic, the farcical and the tragic, such as has perhaps never before been enacted upon the public stage of this old, old planet, has come and gone.

Whether a dramatic pageant or public exhibition so colossal in proportions, so costly in its barbaric display, was ever seen at the court of Genghis Khan, of Kublai Khan, of Tamerlane, or of any other splendor-loving Oriental despot, we do not know, but certainly nothing approaching the pageant seen this week in London, was ever witnessed in any Occidental land since the beginning of what are known as authentic historic records.

And what of the object, what the significance of this record-breaking drama enacted but yesterday in the streets of London, the most populous and the richest city of the world today?

A few years ago there was a somewhat similar pageant seen in Paris—the most beautiful and the gayest of the world's great cities, the object of which public demonstration was to do honor to the memory of a great and good man, Victor Hugo, a man who by his writings, his speeches, and his personal example and sacrifices, had done much for the poor, the oppressed, the enslaved victims of power, of privilege and of superstitious ignorance. A man who had done much to hasten the day when universal brotherhood and a universal commonwealth shall take the place of the isolated and perpetually warring nations, monarchies and aristocracies of today.

At Rome, the "Eternal City," the most famous of the world's ancient capitals, within the memory of most of our readers there was another very remarkable or noteworthy public demonstration in honor of another of the world's most honored names, the name of Giordano Bruno, the man who suffered long years of imprisonment and was then burned at the stake because of his defense of the right of private judgment in religious matters, and because of his efforts to enlarge the field of human knowledge.

As compared to these two world-benefactors, Victor Hugo and Giordano Bruno, what is there in the life-work, or in the personal example of Victoria Guelph, that her mortal remains, her memory, should be honored as those of no other human being have been honored, so far as history can show?

What had she done, said or written, to better the condition of the poor of London, or of the British empire, that hundreds of these poor must be crushed and maimed in the vain effort to catch a passing glimpse of the funeral procession?

In brief, what are the ideas, what the ideals, principles, doctrines, dogmas, with which the life and death of this woman stand identified, that such record-breaking honors should be paid to her memory?

In the sixty-four years during which this woman of German-English parentage, posed as the head of the most powerful empire on the ocean—if not also on the land, that now exists on this planet, what had Victoria done to distinguish her reign from that of any other power-loving and wealth-loving monarch?

In sorrow and pity, not in anger or malice, but in truth and honesty, let it be said because it must, that Queen Victoria lived and died the consistent exponent, exemplar and personification of of imperialism, of capitalistic greed, of superstitious devotion to a barbaric religious creed, and especially to a social and marital code that denies to woman the right of self-ownership and denies to the child the right to be born well, and the men and women who give honor to the memory of Victoria Guelph put themselves on record as advocates and supporters of these ideals, these principles or creeds. Comment—Various.

LOVE, LOGIC, INTUITION, REASON, TRUTH.

The article of Friend Shepherd treating upon these subjects is suggestive and instructive.

Yes, "Logic is good, but love is better." Truth is good; reason is good, but love is better, because without love, truth and reason are worthless. While with love, life might be enjoyable without a knowledge of truth or reason.

Life and all life means or contains, is worthless without love. Without love, organized life would soon cease to exist.

While all this is true of love, in its widest sense, it is scarcely true of "emotion" or "intuition," as these words are commonly understood. Emotion needs to be guided by logic—reason—else it may lead to the destruction of love, and of life as well.

Our friend speaks of "revivals," those "social devastations," as Prof. Heron called them in his lecture here in Chicago last Sunday.

In Kansas a few years ago, in a paroxysm of emotional insanity caused by listening to the "singing" and the suggestive but illogical exhortations of a great revival, a man killed his neighbor—against whom he had no grudge except that he was an "unbeliever," cut out his heart and devoured it. The number of murders and suicides caused by emotion when uncontrolled by logic or reason is quite beyond the power of human calculation.

As to "intuition"—by which mental faculty woman reaches conclusions, and by which the "homing pigeon" unerringly finds its way through the pathless air, I regard intuition as being the sum of unremembered experiences—racial experiences; experiences stored away in the sensorium of man or animal. That intuition is of very great value as a guide to action is freely admitted, but that intuition should be supplemented if not controlled by reason is shown by the fact that the homing pigeon, the ant, the beaver, the honey bee, etc., with all their wondrous wisdom make little or no improvement, from century to century.

What is needed then is that we should supplement intuition by reason, by logic; that is, by analogy and analysis, and if the discovery of truth is our object and not victory in argument, we shall probably find that there is no conflict between intuition and logic. Perhaps we shall find that intuition and logic are identical, the only difference being that, in the one case we are conscious of the mental processes by which the conclusion is arrived at, and in the other we are not.

As for "abstract truth"—if the phrase be not meaningless, a misnomer—I have as little respect and use for that kind of truth as has our correspondent. Altogether too much time and nerve force—to say nothing of loss of temper, health and happiness, are wasted on abstractions. Let us stick to realties, to practicalities. Yes this is a concrete world, a real world, but all realities are not concrete substance, as that phrase is commonly understood. We judge everything, weigh and value everything, by comparing it with something else. Gold or iron is concrete as compared to wood or clay. Wood and clay are concrete when compared to water. Water is concrete to atmospheric air, and this again is concrete when compared to hydrogen gas or to ether.

And so, also, of "concrete truths." All these are relative, rather than absolute. There is no absolute truth or falsehood, right or wrong, good or bad, saint or sinner, god or devil, hell or heaven. All these must be judged by their environment, by their relation to other truths, principles, acts or facts.

The eye of the philosopher sees truth in all, good in all, but finds perfection nowhere. M. H.

Notes from Livesey.

Lucifer's admirable article on the Charles L. Govan case, in its issue of Jan. 26, should remind Brother Moore that Moses Harman is a prophet. I sent it to District Attorney Gay, of Seattle, Washington, accompanied with some of my own anti-Comstock literature. When I first heard of the Govan case, I dropped everything to put the Press-Writers on the case and also at once sent a strong article in defense of the Home people to the "Seattle Times." It was returned, and I afterward sent it to the "Post Intelligence." It was returned and I then sent it to Judge Hanford, of Seattle, with some similar productions I had on hand. All that we write on these lines should by all means go to the parties concerned. If Govan had waited a little while, the Press-Writers could as easily have worked up public sentiment in his favor as they did in the Moore and Clifford cases.

Let it be remembered that all these Comstock laws that we are now suffering under were passed in the heyday of Ingersoll's life. If he had devoted less time to "The Mistakes of Moses" and more to the mistakes of Comstock, the laws would never have seen the light. He, alone, should have been able to avert them. Yet, so it is, Freethinkers ever prefer to talk about the past and neglect the present. Note, for instance, Grier Kidder in California writing on the Virgin Mary, while his state quietly exempts churches from taxation. Lucifer's correspondent, who calls on others to assist him in reimbursing Govan, is a noble man. I should like to know him.

Lucifer did a good thing in its issue of Jan. 12 in calling upon Press-Writers to send articles on marriage and divorce to Arthur Brisbane, care New York "Evening Journal." I complied. I thought the "Journal" or the "Chicago American" vigorous enough to take something out of the usual, and wrote accordingly; but it was politely returned. However, the same sentiments from my pen have appeared in many other papers. Verily, some writer told the truth when he said it was not the big papers that were foremost in advancing the thought of the world.

As showing the worthlessness of some reformers, here is a case: The Philadelphia "Bulletin" of Jan. 17 stated that William Carter was in jail in Ansonia, Conn., for refusing to pay a military tax of $2. He had been there two years, and was expected to die there. On the same day press dispatches stated that the Peace Friends of Boston had been congratulating themselves at a meeting. None of them knew or said a word about Carter. I wrote them about him and they sent my letter to E. B. Benham, President Connecticut Christian Peace Society, at Mystic. He never heard of it also, wanted particulars and said, "We will see that he has his liberty." On Jan. 26, I also gave Ernest H. Crosby a reminder of his duty in this case in a letter to the Rhinebeck (N. Y.) "Gazette"—in his local paper.

I have been trying to work up a controversy between the "Baltimore American," Baltimore Scientists, and "Koresh." I trust Mr. Harman has noted what the "Flaming Sword" has lately said of him.

Edward Stern, in Lucifer of Jan. 26, has my sympathies. I, too, do not send my children to school. Let him send me his address.

Minister Wu says the race problem could be settled by blacks marrying whites. I am going him one better and recommending the Chinese, as the negroes need their industry, patience and economy much more than the idleness, impatience and wastefulness of the average American, educated in the same school as the negro himself.

Every man who gets a reform paper should make use of it by sending it out where it will either help a friend or aggravate a foe—that's my style.

Comstock was in Baltimore recently, making two arrests. I took occasion to appropriately touch him up in the brave Baltimore "World."

The W. C. T. U. is synonymous with Comstockism Now that Mrs. Nation is on the rampage, the shrewd Press-Writers can find many openings to attack the combination.

Representative Robert W. Taylor, of Lisbon, Ohio, said he was going to sweep all before him to carry a national divorce bill he had. This he was to do a month ago. I wrote him, his local papers, other papers, and various congressmen and senators, and he has not shown up yet. Senator Wellington, of Indiana, wrote me he would watch him.

I gave Bryan all encouragement to start his paper, and told him that he ought to take up all questions near and dear to the common people, as well as give them a hearing. His initial number was weak.

Dr. Wilson says there are some 70,000 members of the Secular Union. My! my!! where are they all? In private life I cannot find more than seven worthy the name.

Let us send our congratulations to Mrs. Roland D. Moore, Lancaster, Pa. A few weeks ago she was a beautiful nun, now she is a beautiful wife.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox says: "Don't be divorced if you can help it." Nobody can help it when misery and murder looms up. So Ella will let us have it.

The Philadelphia "Bulletin" (121,000) says "illicit unions" will multiply if restrictions are placed upon divorce. Right! Dr. Charlotte Abbey, of Philadelphia, prepared a sex paper to read before some so-called reform ladies of that city. They wanted her to expunge nine words at least. She refused and kept her paper to herself. Correct! Purity reformer, Mrs. Teats, lectured in the Baltimore theatres "to men only" and "to women only." Said she did not like that style, but had to submit. She should have imitated Dr. Abbey.

Judge McAdam of the New York Supreme Court thinks, "A national divorce law would end bigamy." Bless him, we are not overrun with bigamists. But how would it multiply the grass widows whose latch strings hang ever out for ardent youths and hoary hairs alike. Several live near me.

Dr. Magnus Hershfeld, the famous European physician, says, "Love is essential to matrimony—dissolve the tie if it be lacking." Doctors see humanity as it is.

E. C. Walker had a good one on divorce in Lucifer of Jan. 4. To how many of the opposition was the article sent—that's the rub!

The marriage question is greatly worrying Carroll D. Wright and other statisticians. The papers are full of it. Lucifer's friends never had a better opportunity to make fur fly. I have appeared before scores of bishops and ministers on the subject with good effect.

Judge Henry S. Dewey, of Boston, struck a death blow re cently to the Comstock "spotting" system. He discharged eight girls in one batch, who had been arrested under it. Boston papers commended him. Boston, moves whether the world does or not.

The "Baltimore Sun" of Jan. 29 had an immense leader, headed, "The Marriage and Divorce Problems," following some I have had in near by papers. In the bold "Laurel (Indiana) Democrat," I stated that it was a lie when the ministers said that God joined couples in marriage.

Are there not 200 readers of Lucifer able to write modified articles on sex themes for their local papers? If so, let them begin. Reform papers should glisten with results of such adventures. I could fill Lucifer on that line every week.

Re-Embodiment.

BY J. C. S.

It seems to many believers in natural law that both you and your helpers ignore what is fast becoming an accepted fact among the most thoughtful men and women of the day. An accepted fact because it is coming to be looked upon as a law in nature and applies to everything in life.

I refer to the law of re-formation, or as it is more commonly called, re-incarnation.

Viewed in its entirety, the world and its people are seen in a larger and clearer way when looked at in the light of this truth, and many things which now, in view of the fast passing ideas of so-called Christianity, assume an entirely new and distinct character, for we see that law and absolute justice rule the world.

The great saviors of the world including Christ have taught it both directly and indirectly.

In fact as has been said, by a close student of the times in which we live, it is "the lost chord of Christianity."

Such questions as Lucifer is doing its best to answer are simplified and made much clearer, if we not only consider evolution in the light of the physical body but the evolution of the soul, an entity, a center of consciousness, which not only will always live in the future but always has lived in the past.

"I myself never was not, nor thou, nor all the princes of the earth; nor shall we ever hereafter cease to be," says the holy book which long ages antedates the Bible.

Man, the soul, the Christ within, the Father in heaven, manifests in various bodies for experience and builds its own character. The form and disposition of the new born child are not the result of chance or of hereditary parentage. The former is unthinkable and the latter unjust in a law-governed universe, such as science is proving this to be.

The soul moulds the body and shows what its former life has been, as certainly as the apple seed shows its origin. Its strength and intelligence are medals of honor for the victories in past incarnations; its weakness and vileness are its badges of defeat. As like attracts like in the mineral world, so has like attracted like in the so-called creative world.

We reap as we sow. Each man is physically, mentally, and morally now what he has made himself and will be in future lives what he now makes himself.

We are our own saviors. The only Christ is the divine consciousness within our own heart. That "man's life is an endless battle in which the good and brave are victorious and the mean and cowardly are defeated" is a truism which shines with a perfect light when viewed not by one day's events, not even by one life, but by an eternity of conscious existence which is not one ended and imperfect, but whose beginning never was and whose ending never shall be.

Study the motives of men. Yes, study yourselves with this in view and a new impulse and a new incentive will rule and govern you; a new and larger consciousness will spring up in your soul and you will feel a new joy in life, because you will see the justice of every event. You will see clearly that Brotherhood is a fact in nature and begin to live a life which shall be rich in its sweetness and freedom. You will think justice, act justice and consciously personify justice. This is as nature designed and will do away with the greatest curse of our lives, that of selfishness. This is the rock from which all sorrow and trouble springs. It is the keystone of our arch of social inequalities: It only keeps its place through the ignorance of man.

"Help Nature and work with her, and Nature will regard thee as one of her creators and make obeisance."

"And she will open wide before thee the portals of her secret chambers, lay bare before thy gaze the treasures hidden in the very depths of her virgin bosom. Unsullied by the hand of matter, she shows her treasures only to the eye of Spirit—the eye that never closes, the eye for which there is no veil in all her kingdoms."

"Then will she show thee the means and the way, the first gate, the second, the third—up to the very seventh and then the goal, beyond which lie bathed in the sunlight of the Spirit, glories untold, unseen by any save by the eye of the soul."

The Dead Queen—Dr Chrisman, etc.

BY H. C. G.

I was g'an you had the courage to say what you did of the "Two Millionaires." Of the two we have evidence that Armour gave to the poor more than did the Queen. About all the pulpits could say was that she was a noble woman; that she endeared herself to the people by her womanly dignity, her domestic and wifely example, the rearing of her children and her opposition to war. Have we not thousands of women doing the same?

But what a vast difference! While doing these wifely-duties they are not accumulating millions off other's labor. That is what comes of being a sovereign, but at last both beggar and sovereign leave the world empty-handed.

That saying of Dr. Chrisman will start a mere train of thought with many women, and there is no doubt a great deal of truth in it. Men do not love—cannot love as women do, and that is the reason of so much trouble in the world. They have each been eternally trying to make the other sex come up to their own standard. Men now think they know just what a woman wants, just what she needs, and so write long articles—books as it were, for the women.

Of course they want to show the dear simple things how much they want to help them along.

I once heard a man say of a woman who claimed freedom for her sex, "I do not believe that woman is a free woman." If she had fallen into his arms and gratified his desires she would have been a lovely being—a "free woman," according to his idea of freedom.

But enough of this. I want to tell you a little story. The other day I called on my granddaughter. She has a little girl three years who is bright and pretty, and the first thing she said to me was, "Grandma, I got a kittie! Come out on the back porch and see her."

There was a beautiful gray cat in a box. I said, "where did you get her?"

"O she came here, and mamma says I must not hurt her for she has got some little kitties inside her, and she will have them some day right in this box."

I opened my eyes as if I was astonished. She looked at me as much as to say, "why, don't you know?" Then she said, "mamma told me all about it."

I said, "O how good of her to tell you, and you are a nice little girl to tell me all about it, and you must be good to the old cat so she will have her kitties all right."

I felt glad to think that mother was not ashamed to teach her little girl the truth. So the world, or the people are moving on toward a knowledge of the true and the good. Yours for truth in all things.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Belle Holcomb, Pa.:—I am deeply indebted to you for continuing Lucifer after the time had expired, and if you discontinue now I will pay up all arrearages as soon as I can raise the money. I shall sadly miss the bright little sheet. I take no other paper, being too poor.

Wm. Claussen, Paulina, Iowa:—I send $1.25 to apply on my subscription to Lucifer. Have any of the Lucifer readers read "Regeneration," a book on the sex question by S. A Weltmer, Nevada, Mo. I recommend it. Having never noticed it entered in Lucifers columns, I would be pleased to see criticism or comments on it by anyone who has reviewed it.

A. B. Bennett, Norwalk, Conn.:—I feel that you are fighting a glorious battle in the cause of humanity, and certainly should receive your reward here and now, but reformers are not appreciated until after they are dead. I believe, Brother, the work you and your daughter are doing will be appreciated, but in this age of selfishness and greed the cause you are battling to reform is the least thought of by the majority of the people. Enclosed find fifty cents.

E. C. Walton, Muscatine, Ia.:—Enclosed find seventy-five cents to apply on subscription. Your editorials are excellent. Hardly any man can suit us so well on general subjects. And of Crosby we think it quite wonderful that he should be so advanced. We were glad to hear of—if not from E. C. Walker. He is one of the excellent of earth. Lizzie Holmes is a clear thinker and writer and I don't know but she is nearer right on sex than yourself. Myself being judge—but we are all for freedom.

Oscar Johnson, San Francisco, Calif.:—Am in favor of having a continued story in Lucifer, and, if nothing better is in view, would suggest to print part of Max Nordeau's "Conventional Lies," especially the "Matrimonial Lie" and perhaps the "Religious Lie." Probably there are many of Lucifer's readers who are not acquainted with this famous writer, and as it is in line with Lucifer's teaching it would be welcome to many and a relief from "Teed's Koreshanity." In the year 1895 in June and July there appeared in the "Arena" two articles by B. O. Flower, dealing with the "Rights of Children" and the matrimonial question. In my judgment those two articles are worth reproducing.

"The Commoner," R. C. Clyde, Portland, Oregon: Enclosed you will find a list of new subscribers and amount to pay for the same. They are progressive young people who desire to study the sex question for the purpose of bettering the condition of humanity. Your bright little Lucifer has very deeply interested them and they can be enrolled among its noble supporters in the future. Let each of Lucifer's readers go out among their friends and by securing a few subscriptions make it a tremendous power for good.

Later:—Enclosed you will find the names of two more subscribers to the brightest little journal on earth—Lucifer. The other subscribers are well pleased and we hope to make Portland the banner city on your list.

H. M. C., Iowa:—I have just read your editorial on the death of Armour and Queen Victoria and I want to shake hands with you, and say "Them's my sentiments!" I've been hitting everybody in this town just such raps, but you know how people are in a small town! What some popular person says, the whole crowd repeats and believes. Have noted the report of meetings in Chicago and wish I could have attended. I'm to read a paper on St. Valentine the 14th in one of the churches of this city and if any of you folks have anything fresh about the pagan festival from which it originated would be very glad to have it.

Victoria's private fortune was 150,000,000 not 25,000,000.

[If any of our readers can help our Iowa friend to prepare an address on the subject named we will forward letters to her if sent in our care.—M. H.]

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

'The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says; "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages, 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Paper covers 50 cents, Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul. "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents, Cloth bound $1.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form By E. C. Walker. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"A WOMAN in order to live the purest life, must be FREE, must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially."—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD," by Henry Olerich. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 4 0 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy Price $1. For sale at this office.

Freethought Ideal, Edited by Etta Semple, is published fortnightly at Ottawa, Kansas. It is the only atheistic paper in the world edited and published by a woman. Fifty cents per year. Samples free.

DO YOU EVER THINK

Of the fate of the Prodigal Daughter? The Prodigal Son is forgiven and received with rejoicing—why should different treatment be accorded to his sister? For a vivid, true picture of the conditions in homes and factories which produce thousands of so-called fallen women every year, read "The Prodigal Daughter; or, The Price of Virtue," by Rachel Campbell. Price, 25 cents.

Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness who addresses humanity.—From the Preface.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gliders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., NO. 5. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, FEB. 17, E. M. 301. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE NO. 852.

Victory.

Victory at the end, there's no defeat!
Let Tyranny have its day and then depart.
In mankind's teeming brain and throbbing heart
Slow germinate and bloom the measures meet.
There is no shame that shall not be atoned,
No suffering or wrong that can endure:
Humanity is silent but is sure,
Triumph is not abandoned but postponed.

We may not share the glories of the goal,
Nor even view afar the promised land:
Enough to leap a-thrilled at love's command,
Go down in battle with a deathless soul!
The banner's borne aloft above the fray,
We perish, but the truth and victory stay.

William Mountain in Conservator.

The Question of Illegitimacy.

Of all the ways by and through which man, the stronger sex, in his blindness and love of power, has dishonored and enslaved womanhood and motherhood, and thereby dishonored and enslaved himself, none have been more unjust, cruel and indefensible than are the laws and customs regarding legitimacy, bastardy, right to inherit paternal name and property, etc., etc.

The ancient Hebrew code, a code that has served as a basis for many if not most of the laws now in force among what are known as Christian nations, is the following:

"A bastard shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord; even to his tenth generation shall he not enter into the congregation of the Lord"—Deut. 23, 2.

According to Blackstone, regarded as high authority, if not the highest, by American as well as English lawyers, "bastards are such children as are not born either in lawful wedlock, or within a competent time after its determination."—Alden's Manifold Cyclopedia.

Volumes might be written and yet not tell the half of the wrongs to woman, and through her to the race of humankind, by this attempt on the part of the law-making sex to control the exercise of that function through and by which the race is reproduced.

As usual with all man-made laws and customs the greater share of the hardships and sufferings from bastardy laws falls upon those least able to bear them, and upon those who had no share in the making of such laws, namely, the woman and her child.

The subject of legitimacy involves and includes the whole of the marriage and divorce legislation that now graces, or more correctly disgraces, the statute books of all lands claiming to be civilized—to say nothing of the rituals of all religious organizations, therefore cannot be adequately treated of in one short newspaper article. The immediate occasion for introducing this subject here and now is the leading editorial in the "Chicago American" of Feb. 8, entitled "A Great Man's Son is Worth Ten Cents, If Mother and Father are not Affectionate." This editorial was written in response to this question from a correspondent:

"Would you have a man take into his house a child whose father and mother were not married? Can you expect any good from such a child?"

Replying the editor said, in part:

"We believe that a child, even illegitimate, may well repay the care that is given to it.

"William the Conqueror was an illegitimate child. His father, the Duke of Normandy, was an able man. His mother was the daughter of a simple tanner. He, the Conqueror, was the greatest of his line, and that added greatness came from his mother, and his illegitimacy did not affect it.

"Leonardo Da Vinci was an illegitimate son. He was a great artist, a great engineer, a man of marvelous natural scientific ability, the son of a peasant girl. Of all men on earth he was the first to recognize the true character of fossil remains and to dispel the foolish theories concerning them. He stood six feet four, could bend a horse-shoe with his hands, build bridges, fortify towns and paint some of the most marvelous of pictures. He was a success, although illegitimate, and he would have been well worth caring for.

"Cæsar Borgia, Machiavelli's ideal statesman, was another illegitimate child. Marshal Saxe, who gained the victory of Fontenoy, was the illegitimate son of Augustus II. of Saxony and of Aurora von Konigsmark.

"Ten such newspapers as this, filled with the finest of print, could not even outline the achievements of the world's great 'illegitimate children.'

"Instead of alleging that the child unfortunately born is worthless, ask yourself how it happens that among children thus born such an extraordinary number achieve greatness.

"If you ask yourself that question we shall with pleasure furnish you the answer.

"The mind of the child, his power of intellect, reflect the sentimental conditions attending his birth.

"A child is worth while in proportion to his parents' love for each other.

"Every man may condemn—and usually justly—the father of the child born outside of wedlock. But every one must admit, on the mother's side at least, genuine affection, however sinful or misled.

"That affection is reflected in the character of the child. That affection accounts for the wonderful success of the illegitimate among men. Da Vinci's father married and had children, but not one save Leonardo, the illegitimate was ever heard of.

"The poor mother has often many children, and often the last of a long line is the ablest. In humble life true love most often persists.

"The rich and the powerful are wise in giving the succession to their first born. For that first born gets at least the advantage of a sort of artificial preliminary affection.

"Napoleon's mother had thirteen children. Every one was a remarkable personage—because she loved the father of them. To explain Napoleon's greatness it is not necessary to dig up the empty legend that his real father was Paoli. The source of his greatness was his peasant mother's sincere love for the father of her children.

"Napoleon had but one child, the whining, useless, 'Aiglon' of the popular play. That little king of Rome amounted to nothing. Why? Because his mother never loved his father. This mother wrote after Napoleon's death that she never felt any love for him."

Reference is made by the "American" to "William the Conqueror," from whom the present royal family of England claims, if I mistake not, to be descended. It is recorded that instead of trying to conceal the fact that his birth was not authorized by priest or magistrate he gloried in his "illegitimacy." Before his succession to the crown of England it is said that he signed his state papers Gulielmus Bastardus—"William the Bastard"! If a bastard should not enter the congregation of the Lord, even to his tenth generation, then the English people have been governed by a line of kings and queens who were unfit for participation in the religious rites, duties and privileges of the church of which these kings and queens have claimed to be the visible head.

The central double column article on the editorial page of the edition from which I here quote is headed, in large display type, "How Great is the Name of Woman"? In this article the editor asks:

"What present event can you mention of universal interest without calling attention to some woman?"

He then mentions the death of the British queen; the wedding of the queen of Holland; the "hatchet" raid upon saloons in Kansas by Mrs. Nation; the sensational trial of four men in New Jersey for complicity in the murder of Miss Boscheiter; the sensational account of the attempted murder of a New Jersey clergyman, at the bottom of which attempt there is a woman; the mysterious murder at Pittsfield, Mass., which is also said to be a "woman mystery," adding,

"Every plot in fiction, every theme in poetry, every strange feature of real news is based on woman and her doings."

Does not all this confirm the saying often repeated in Lucifer that in more ways than one, and that the race itself cannot rise except as woman rises?

WOMAN IS THE RACE,

M. H.

"Are Illegitimate Children Dangerous?"

Is a question gravely asked by the editor of the "Chicago American." Here is a letter which calls forth the question:

"I have read your editorial advising bachelors and others without children to adopt a baby from the Foundling Asylum and bring it up as their own. I wish to ask whether you have considered the dangerous advice that you give? Don't you know that many, if not the majority, of the children in foundling asylums are illegitimate children? Would you have a man take into his house a child whose father and mother were not married? Would you have him bring up a boy or girl to disgrace him in later life? Can you expect any good from such a child? Give us your opinion about this as frankly as you gave it before."—T. K. R.

The editor replies that it is unsafe for any one to criticise another human being; and foolish as well as unsafe to predict evil for a child because of its mother's misfortune. He concludes that "each human being is the abode of a human soul" and is put here by the "power that rules the universe," hence it is worth caring for.

It does not seem to occur to our editor that the "power" that placed these souls here is responsible for their welfare, and probably does not need the assistance of the "Chicago American." If this "power" placed 366 infants on Randall's Island in 1896, and let all die but twelve, he, and not the officials in charge, was responsible for the deaths.

Intense, real love is always creative. "The passion rebuilds the world for the youth," says Emerson, and again: "It expands the sentiment, it makes the clown gentle, and gives the coward heart. Into the most pitiful and abject it will infuse a heart and courage to defy the world, so only it have the countenance of the beloved object. In giving him to another it still more gives him to himself. He is a new man, with new perceptions, new and purer purposes, and a religious solemnity of character and aims."

A child born of mutual love such as this must be well endowed mentally and physically, even though all other conditions are adverse. Editor Brisbane realizes this truth, as will be seen in the defense of illegitimate children quoted elsewhere in this issue, which appeared in the "American" the day following the foregoing letter.

Waifs Adopted by Childless Women.

Under this heading the Philadelphia "North American" publishes the following dispatch from New York dated January 29.

"Only two pitiful little waifs, thin and ailing, remain tonight on Superintendent Blair's baby bargain counter at Randall's Island. They are the 'scraps,' as Matron Dumphy calls them. No one in the steady procession of childless women, whose hearts ached for the love of a little one, wanted the frail little mites.

"All the other babies have been spoken for and tagged, and there were not half enough to go around. The surprising fact suddenly dawned upon Matron Dumphy for the first time that there are not near enough babies in New York.

"The rush for babies to adopt began two days ago. Again the women came in droves today. All except those who came early in the morning went away disappointed. All the babies available on demand had been taken. Two hundred visited the island to get one of the little foundlings that they had heard were to be given away to any one who wanted a baby.

"It was a little item in the newspapers which brought from cover the thousands who are pining for the sunshine of a babe in the home. Philanthropic ladies who, as heads of societies, spend fortunes and many hours trying to find homes for foundlings, were amazed at the wonderful response of the childless.

"Two actresses, well known on Broadway, came. One, richly dressed and wearing diamonds, arrived about noon with her maid. With a serious look she said she wanted to find a little girl among the foundlings to bring up. A tear came into her eye when the matron told her that all the babies had been spoken for.

"Three women from the most fashionable hotels of the city went to the island looking for babies. Two of them were in time to select two bright little chips of humanity, who cooed all day."

The dispatch does not inform us how many babies were adopted; but it is safe to assume that the number was large. To Randall's Island are sent all the homeless babies of New York. The State cares for them, and as an example of the beneficent care of the State, take the record of 1896. In that year 366 infants were sent to Randall's Island. Of this number only twelve survived. In view of the fate of these foundlings, the recently adopted babies are to be congratulated.

More Blessed to Destroy Than to Create.

The regular army is to cost $118,000,000 for the coming year, says the "Chicago American." At the same time Congress is congratulating itself upon its liberality in giving a hospitable reception to a scheme involving an ultimate expenditure of $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 a year for the irrigation of the arid lands of the west. The army expenditure goes mostly for pure destruction; the irrigation expenditure would be equivalent to the annexation of millions of homesteads to the public domain.

If there were no legalized injustice there would be no criminals and no need for policeman or jails.—Independent.

Freak Legislation.

Geo. E. Macdonald, in "Truth Seeker."

The humble endeavor of the state of Wisconsin to improve the race by regulating marriage is not approved by the editor of the "New York Journal," who knows everything. In Wisconsin, so the "Journal" says, a board of physicians, including a woman when possible, must pass upon all candidates for matrimony, and those with physical or mental flaws will not be allowed to wed. The plan fails to secure the "Journal's" endorsement for the reason that "nature has made such plans for improving the race as cannot be improved upon by earthly legislation." Nature's "plans" are all in the editor's think-tank; but I guess he is right about the inability of legislation, whether "earthly" or lunar, to improve the race. It is true that married people are more liable to become parents than the unmarried, and it seems reasonable to conclude that should the state refuse to sanction the union of defective persons they would be less likely to raise children to inherit their infirmities; still there is always a chance that the offspring will be better than the parents, for if this were not so there could never have been any improvement at all. As an experiment, the state might go this far: it might withhold its sanction from a marriage, either party to which was tainted with insanity or any transmissible disease. Every city official might be prohibited from performing such marriages, and when performed by a minister of the gospel the state should hold them void, declining to enforce the obligations assumed or to settle the disputes of the parties about property and maintenance. If the state of Wisconsin has actually passed a law forbidding imperfect people to marry, I should say it had exceeded its just powers, which ought not to be stretched beyond instructing its hired men not to unite such persons to each other. Legislation touching fools and marriage might be patterned to some extent after that regulating Indians and liquor: the Indians are not prohibited from drinking, but selling it to them is a felony. There is the difference, however, between getting full and getting married, that if a man acquires a jag he can sober off later, but if he takes a wife there is no help for him. Not a life of strenuous virtue—nothing but death—will atone for this one false step.

The Wisconsin Board of Conjugal Experts would prove itself to be a beneficent tribunal provided it were merely advisory in the case of marriage, as with other diseases not infectious. People need information more than coercion, and nine out of ten, when seriously warned that their marriage must prove unsuccessful for sanitary reasons, would forego it. The tenth would serve as an awful warning against spurning good advice.

Since disengaging the above thoughts, I have seen a synopsis of the Wisconsin marriage bill. Its provisions are as indicated by the "Journal," but it has not yet become a law. Couples must get a certificate from the doctors before they can get a license, or the minister who unites them to each other and separates them from their money will be fined not more than $500 or confined in prison not more than one year. This is freak legislation, calculated to put the statute book upon the list of humorous works.

The Pet Horse-Leech.

Auberon Herbert, in "Free Life."

As soon as ever human skill or invention has discovered some new means of increasing human comfort and safety, then the State steps in and limits the usefulness of the invention by taxing it. It is the queerest invention, this modern State! I once heard of a man who had a pet horse-leech and used to amuse himself by supplying the leech with breakfasts and dinner from his own blood-vessels. When I last heard, the owner of the leech had become something like a walking-skeleton, but he would not give up his horse-leech. So deep is the passion for self-martyrdom in this half-absurd, half-pathetic race of ours!

The law is simply a system of fossilized injustice; there is not enough of intellectual interest about it to occupy an intelligent mind for an hour.—Durant.

A Socialist in Prison.

The "Springfield Republican" of Feb. 5 tells of an interesting case at Palmer, where a young socialist has been sentenced to a year's imprisonment for distributing a pamphlet which was obnoxious—as far as I can judge, for I have not yet seen a copy—to church supporters in his town. Socialism is increasing rather rapidly in Massachusetts and this case of what appears to be, and very likely is, persecution, will but serve to augment socialistic ranks. This case is not under United States postal laws, as you will see, but under State laws, and I presume will be reopened and contested vigorously. I shall watch its progress with interest, and will send further clippings as the matter is brought before the public. The following statement of the case is condensed from the "Republican." AMICUS.

"The story of Allen's arrest and conviction seems to interest a large number of people, few of whom are familiar with the facts. Mr. Allen is thirty-three years old. He is a son of O. P. Allen, who is widely known as one of the oldest druggists in eastern Hampden. The young man has been associated with his father in business for several years, and is also well known. He has gained some notoriety as a socialist. A week ago yesterday the young man distributed several copies of a pamphlet which created a sensation. It was entitled 'Hot Stuff,' and contained an article which was headed 'The church rivals the saloon as a breeder of crime.' The article consisted of an attack upon the church. It was written in very forceful terms, which were very offensive to most church people.

"There was much unfavorable comment and also frequent suggestion that Mr. Allen ought to be prosecuted. At least three lawyers gave their opinion that the pamphlet came under the statute which provides that the distribution of pamphlets containing obscene, indecent and impure language, or language manifestly tending to corrupt the morals of the young, is a crime. Several prominent citizens called the attention of the clerk of court to the pamphlet, and asked that a prosecution be begun. A warrant was issued, upon which Mr. Allen was arrested Wednesday morning. He was taken to court at once and the case was tried.

"Mr Allen rejected the advice of the officer in reference to employing counsel. He stated that he was ready for trial, and when asked by the clerk if he wanted counsel, replied. 'I am indifferent as to that.' When the complaint was read and he was asked the usual question, whether guilty or not guilty, he replied that he could not answer that question, and that he refused to do so. A plea of not guilty was entered. Four witnesses were called, who testified that Allen had given them copies of the pamphlet, without solicitation upon their part. Allen took the stand himself and in reply to questions stated that he wrote the article in question, had it printed in Chicago and had distributed some of the pamphlets. He said his object was to call the attention of the people to the subject of socialism, which they all ought to know more about. He intended no injury to the morals of young or old and did not think anything in the pamphlet would corrupt. He said it contained truths which should be known. He also made an address of a socialistic nature, which convinced his hearers that he was entirely sincere in all he said.

"In summing up the case, the judge found the only question for him to decide to be whether the pamphlet properly came under the statute. It was not obscene and contained no language which could be strictly ruled indecent or impure. The judge thought there could be no question about the pamphlet having a tendency to corrupt the morals of the young, however, and upon this head pronounced him guilty. He spoke of his long acquaintance with the prisoner, whom he had always considered a worthy young man. He thought, however, he could not in justice impose a sentence of less than one year in the house of correction. Allen made no appeal, and later stated that he was willing to be a martyr in the cause of socialism."

Solution of the Industrial Problem.

In the news columns of the "Chicago Chronicle," Sunday, Februrary 10, under the head "Points to Woman as Savior," appears the following:

Women of the home department of the Catholic Woman's National league were told yesterday afternoon by William Dillon, editor of the "New World," that a true wife, a good mother and a pure home would be the savior of the twentieth century. It would not be, he said, the settlement of the social and economical problems that would rid the world of the materialistic evils of the nineteenth century.

Mr. Dillon addressed the league members and guests in the Corinthian hall at the Masonic Temple. His subject was "At the Dawn of the Twentieth Century." He considered the social and economical problems worthy of consideration and settlement and expected that great strides would be made in these matters before the dawn of the twentieth century had passed away. A moral millennium, however, would be necessary before the world was relieved of many of the material evils which he said had fastened themselves upon the people during the last century. He advised that more attention be given the spiritual and less to the material condition of the world.

Quoting Edwin Markham, the "Chicago American"—which paper is now giving much prominence to marriage, the home, and to woman's place in the social and creative realm, says:

"Better born babies is the solution of the industrial problem."

While it may be true that neither Markham nor the "American" see very clearly all the changes in our social structure that would have to come before the industrial problem can be solved in the way indicated in the above brief sentence, the fact that such utterances can find a place in journals of such vast circulation and influence as the "Chicago American," the San Francisco "Examiner" and the New York "Evening Journal," is an omen of tremendous significance.

It means, as some of us read signs of the times, that reformers are at last beginning to realize the all important fact that to build a house the foundations must first be laid; that the walls, the floors and the roof cannot successfully be reared and placed without foundation stones or timbers. That we cannot expect to see the trunk, the branches, the leaves, blossoms and fruit of the towering oak one hundred feet high until the root has first penetrated the soil in search of the solid materials which, joined to lighter elements drawn from the atmosphere, compose the framework and crowning glories of this patriarch of the forest.

And so also of the structure sometimes called human society. This organic, and yet unorganic aggregation is composed of individual units each of which is the product of heredity and environment, the most forceful and fateful factor in which heredity and environment is the work of the mother, the influence of the mother, during the nine months preceding birth.

If, then, we would have a noble, a worthy, social structure, a symmetrical, a beautiful, a grand and glorious social structure we must look well to the foundation—look well to the beginnings of life in each individual organism, since the social aggregation, the social structure, can be no better than the individual units of which it is composed.

The only real organism is the individual unit.

William Dillon, editor of "The New World" thinks that "a true wife, a good mother and a pure home would be the savior of the twentieth century." These words need definition. What does he mean by a true wife? Is it one who is "true" to the Pauline command, "Wives obey your husbands in all things," one who religiously accepts as her God-ordained fate the curse pronounced upon Eve—"Thy desire shall be to thy husband and he shall rule over thee"?

This has been the teaching of the church in all the years of its power, and the result has been just what we would naturally expect. "As ye sow, so shall ye reap." The mother submits to irresponsible power and to selfish greed in the most important of all human relations, the creative, and the natural product is seen in offspring that submits without question to the irresponsible power of a master; to the narrowly selfish greed of capitalistic bosses such as today rob and enslave the working masses, the stupid, self-sacrificing, authority-worshipping masses.

Yes, woman must be the savior of the twentieth century, but in order to save others woman must first

SAVE HERSELF!

In order to free others she must herself be free—free from the enslaving superstition that her purity, her "virtue," consists in being "true" to a priest-made code of sex ethics. A code which says woman's body is not her own; that it belongs primarily to the state and to the church, and can be given or sold by these masters to a MAN, to have and to hold to the exclusion of all others, so long as life shall last.

Woman must learn first of all that her highest purity, her highest virtue, consists in being TRUE TO HERSELF, and that until she does this she cannot be true to any other person, or to the larger ego, the social aggregation.

"To thine own self be true,
And then it follows as the night the day
Thou canst not be untrue to any man."

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

Apotheosis of a Monarch

While there is much, very much in contemporary journalism to cause us to "thank God [good women and men] and take courage," there is also very much to induce the opposite state of mind. The nearly universal outburst of praise, of glorification, almost of deification of the dead English queen and empress of India, a woman who during a long life lived the personification of monarchy, of aristocracy, of monopoly, of privilege, of undeserved titles, of unearned rank, of hereditary caste, of inequity (iniquity), of old-time conservatism, of subjection of woman to man—except for the very few women who happen to be born of a royal house—that a woman with a record such as this should receive the exceptional honors, the record-breaking honors, accorded to her, not only from her own subjects and from contemporary monarchs and their satellites but from millions who profess to be democrats, republicans, advocates of "liberty, equality and fraternity," is one of the unexplained and apparently inexplicable mysteries of the dawning months of the so-called twentieth century.

As a partial relief from the contemplation of such unmanly and unwomanly sycophancy, such idealization if not deification of the old, the conventional, the reactionary I am glad to insert a paragraph or two from a long letter in the Springfield (Mass.) "Republican," written by Agnes Cameron Watson:

As to Queen Victoria as ruler, wife, mother and benefactor of her people, I believe she was just an average human woman, and had she not been a queen we would never have heard of her or her virtues. In her domestic, social, moral and religious life, she was ultra conventional, and if profligacy was not permitted in her court, it was rife in her kingdom, most conspicously in her son, who is now hailed with as much acclaim by his subjects as if he embodied all the vaunted virtues of his mother. I have never heard that Queen Victoria ever departed from the traditions of the "divine rights of kings," or that the alliances in the royal family were ever made on higher grounds than reasons of state. She seemed to know, too, how to look to the "main chance" for her children, as was exemplified in one of her latest acts, arranging for the succession to the crown to descend to the offspring of the duchess of Fife. All of which shows that she was very human, but not great or noble.

I do not believe any truly good and noble woman could be a queen to begin with, and live the life of pomp and luxury that is paid out of the blood of the dear people to whom she is credited with being not only sovereign, but mother. Nor could a truly good and noble woman accumulate such a fortune as she is said to have done, while millions of her subjects were perishing of famine abroad, and hunger and misery at home. The one thing for which Victoria is to be honored—if it is true—is that she was for peace and opposed the Boer war, and that her death was hastened by the grief and horror of its injustice. I should be glad to think this rumor was true, as I should like to respect her as a human being, if not as a queen.

Yes, I, too, would like to be able to respect the memory of Victoria Guelph as a human being, if not as a queen—which is simply impossible. M. H.

A Sensible Creed.

A booklet of thirty-seven pages called the Gospel According to Nature, by a "North American," sets out with what seems to Lucifer's scribe a more sensible creed than that of any Christian sect known to the said scribe. It reads thus:

I believe there is nothing but life;
That life manifests as spirit, matter, and energy;
That energy is spirit and matter in motion;
That matter is dense spirit;
That spirit is refined matter;
That the golden rule is the law of life;
That the visible universe is the body of God;
That competition is the spirit of God;
That competition is the formulator of all conditions, good and evil.

Further on our Indian says:

I believe God is a spirit who manifests as supply and demand; that competition is God, in fact; and that the kingdom of heaven is the kingdom of competition; just so and not otherwise.

I might have said with equal or even greater truth that the kingdom of heaven is the kingdom of love or service. But sloppy sentimentalists have so emasculated those words they now retain little or none of that virility which is such a marked characteristic of competition—the most awful, or the most beneficent force in existence. Besides, there is no supply without a demand; no love without a correspondent; no positive without a negative; facts that are identical with the polarity of life and fill it with seeming contradictions.

These paragraphs seem characteristic of the entire booklet which can be had by addressing P. O. Box 443 DesMoines, Iowa, and enclosing ten cents. M. H.

"Free Society" in Chicago.

Pursuant to announcement made in Lucifer some weeks ago our San Francisco cotemporary "Free Society" is now published in this city, at 515 Carroll Ave. Two issues of "Free Society" have appeared since the removal and Lucifer asks the privilege of sincerely congratulating our young but strong, brave and very radical neighbor on the enterprise and energy exhibited in these two latest issues. If we have been a little tardy in extending the right hand of welcome to our faithful and very efficient co worker, in this public manner, it has not been because of lack of desire so to do, but simply because of absorption in our own field of work.

If we are to judge from the very decidedly improved appearance of "Free Society" Bro. Isaac, the publisher, is meeting with much encouragement from the radical element in a city of two million inhabitants. If it should prove by trial, that two radical papers cannot live side by side in Chicago it will certainly not be for lack of room, nor lack of need of reform work, or reform papers, and therefore we once more extend to neighbor Isaac and his noble band of workers a most hearty welcome, with the earnest hope that this latest change of base of theirs will be the beginning of a new era of prosperity and of usefulness for them and their publications. M. H.

Different in Patagonia.

Unlike Massachusetts, men there make equals of their wives, says Prof. Ellen Hayes of Wellesley College. In an address on "Women and Democracy," before the "Woman's Baptist Social Union," in Boston, recently, she made the following statements, as quoted by the Boston "Herald:"

"She said the ideas of equality and liberty were comparatively modern. She spoke of the persistent subjection of woman to man. Every religion in the world, as formed by men, has recognized the subjection of women. Brute force was the rule with primitive man, but democracy struck the keynote of the belief that the world is for every one. She went on to say that no equality of race could ever mean as much as the equality of the sexes.

"Keep her ignorant, and you will keep her womanly, was the cry until it was found woman could be educated and yet be womanly. There are those who are determined to keep woman in her place. They are the legislators who vote 'no' on the various questions concerning women. They are the editors and ministers who use newspapers and pulpits against the democracy of opportunity. Prof. Hayes spoke of one of the Patagonian tribes whose men make equals of their wives. The women never saw a fashion paper, a chafing dish, nor a shopping bag, but they have equality with their husbands."

VARIOUS VOICES.

Mrs. Ezra H. Heywood, 991 Massachusetts Ave., Cambridge, Mass.:—Please send me ten of each "To Mothers" and "Do You Know." I will be a "committee of one" to distribute them.

C. Hartshorne:—Here may be an answer to the last Koreshan inquiry. Engineers decided years ago that the water level of the Mississippi is higher at the mouth, (New Orleans) than towards the source (St. Louis). Give me a quarter, Koresh!

Gaezn Clark, Summerland, Calif.:—I enclose twenty-five cents for a copy of the "Prodigal Daughter, or the Price of Virtue." I have seen your advertisement in "Freedom," and I have just received a copy of Lucifer, and would like to see more of them.

Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Va.:—I thank thee ever so much for keeping my little ad running. It is strange how few women respond! The great majority of men and women who have written me through the ad seem well pleased. But oh, dear! how many of them are mismated and live in misery. It will not be so always. Those are mainly people who married long ago and the children hold them together. The young (those who read Lucifer and other reform papers) will not stay yoked. They are better educated in this line.

R. H. P., North Cambridge, Mass.:—Perhaps it is the effect of growing old, but anyway, each year I find less time to live my own life, because it takes more time to live the life I am paid for living—and which pays my living. I enclose $3, for which send me all the numbers of Light-Bearer Library that you have, "The New Hedonism," "Worship of Primitive Social Guesses," and then apply the remainder on Lucifer as far as it will go. Though it is often a month or two between times of my reading Lucifer I do not lose my interest in your work, and there is hardly a day in which I do not think of it. I trust all is well with you [L. H.] personally, with your dear little one and your father, to whom my regards and best wishes for better health, which is probably the best thing I could wish him. For yourself, as always, all good wishes and my sincere admiration for your work.

J. B. Watson, Plymouth, England:—I was telling a lady friend of mine the other day of your noble work in behalf of women in the States and she became much interested in the matter. I should be glad if you would kindly send me a copy of Lucifer containing an account of the disgraceful manner in which some poor girl was treated in the lumber regions of Wisconsin. You may remember a girl who answered an advertisement, on being met at the depot, was conveyed by buggy to a house where she was kept for an improper purpose, and in trying to effect her escape was chased by armed men and blood hounds. It may have been two years ago, perhaps longer, but I think you will remember this case. If you can find the paper I would be glad if you would send me a copy, and one or two others giving instances of abuses which you have been instrumental in exposing to the searchlight of justice. I will enclose money order of fifty cents for papers, etc.

E. W. Dewey, Dimond, Jan. 23 1901:—I see something to write you about in the way of comment almost every week, but it goes by and some one else may give my ideas or may not. I wish to endorse what "A., New York," says as to serial stories in Lucifer. There have been several in Lucifer in times past. I have only read them partially; but most of them far enough to the opinion expressed by your New York correspondent. There is not room in Lucifer for long or continued stories anyway. They are a waste of space to most readers, I think. So you are soon to have another Liberal Luminary in Chicago—"Free Society." Well, I trust it will prove a good move. But its loss may make more room for "Discontent," though there are none of our journals near enough to each other now to interfere in circulation. I wonder, almost, at the success they have attained. They all have the right kind of push behind them in management and editorially. I often wish I was so situated that I could bear a helping hand as a newspaper man.

Wm. Cox, Oakland, Ill.:—Please tell Mrs. M. T., of Ohio, with her four small children and a constant fear of more, that this country is just literally full of strong healthy doctors who are willing to impart the information she wants to any good-looking woman that will pay them their price for such information. It is a shame and a disgrace in this enlightened age that our wives, our mothers, our sisters and our daughters should have to sell their virtue for that bit of knowledge. But that is what they are doing and what they will do just so long as they cannot obtain it in any other way. I have just received by the last mail a sample copy of a paper that carries advertisements of about a score of sure-enough preventives. One reads, "No anxiety when you use this." Another reads, "Saves worry and doubt. Never fails." I have not the honor of the acquaintance of the publisher, but no doubt he is another good man like Mr. Colgate, he who made soap that is good to prevent conception and incidentally a little fortune that his widow could give in exchange for a title.

William Platt, St. Martin's Lane, London, W. C., Eng.:—Glad to hear your "Autobiog" is approaching a finish. If you will send me a copy as soon as it is ready I will not only send in return several of my own books but also do my utmost to review it for several advanced papers here in England. I shall look for it with interest, being one who has long admired your extremely fair and open conduct in the running of your paper. My own work as publicist swallows up all my spare cash, but I think the way I suggest should prove better than money to you.

[Sincerely thanking our London friend for his kind words of appreciation and encouragement, and for his generous offer to review the Autobiography for several advanced papers across the "herring pond," I would say to him, and to all who take interest in the matter, that the autobiography in question is by no means as near to a finish as its author and publisher could wish. Other duties, other claims upon his time and very limited strength still prevent the concentration upon the book that is necessary to secure its early delivery. If, however, we can now have the prompt and helpful co-operation of the subscribers to the book, and also of the subscribers to Lucifer and the Light-Bearer Library, the work on the book will be pushed to an early completion. M. H.]

Amicus, Mass.:—I enclose herewith $5—one dollar to pay for another year of the ever-welcome Lucifer; two to pay for two copies of your autobiography, already subscribed for but not paid for, and which I hope you will have both health and time to complete soon; one to continue my three copies of Light-Bearer Library another year. I don't know when my subscription to it expires, but presume at number twelve. Then I would like a dozen copies of "The Bar Sinister and Licit Love," and I enclose a couple of addresses to whom to send sample copies of Lucifer. They are of persons who may like the publication, although I do not care to have them know who furnished their addresses.

I find it necessary to be very circumspect in my doings, nor do I regard it as cowardice to be so. All honor to those who are so situated that they can be outspoken in their beliefs, as some correspondents of Lucifer think everyone should be, but I am sure that often one can do better service for a cause like freedom in sexual affairs, that has a limited number of followers, by advocating, in public, only some of its less radical features, among people who would not for a moment listen thoughtfully to the arguments of a more outspoken liberal. I am able oftentimes to explain that some radical view under discussion "is not so shocking, after all, as it at first seems;" afterwards I quote from Grant Allen, as a scientist; then back my remarks by statistics from various sources, and observe that "we should carefully examine all sides of a question, without being too hasty to decide." Thus, safely lodged in my non-committal fortifications, I shower what Christians might well term, from their point of view, "poisoned" arrows of thought at the conservative position. This mode of arguing does not excite contrariety, but leads people to think over the subject later, and I have found it to work well. My code of ethics may be subject to criticism, it is true, as involving negative deceit, but it does not seem wrong when used in opposition to the many unjust weapons of oppression and of deception by which liberalism is attacked. One has a right to fight from an ambush for a just cause, when enemies are too numerous.

Thomas Paine Societies.

BY J. B. ELLIOTT.

In conversation with Mrs. Florence Johnson last fall in New York, we came to the conclusion that it was time that the friends and admirers of Thomas Paine should be organized, and like Col. Ingersoll I thought I would do my part by organizing the society in this city where the greater part of Paine's life was spent in the dark days of '76.

We have succeeded, and as the result I send you our first program. It contains the portrait now hanging in Independence Hall; from a photograph taken direct from the portrait.

This portrait was presented by a small band of Paine's admirers through Forrester L. Taylor of Virginia in 1859, but after a fight of sixteen years it was not accepted until 1875. So you see why I selected this particular portrait for our first.

There are other important features that our society have in view. We believe that what we do ought to be done in a first class manner and by first class artists and we want to keep in touch with the Paineites through the United States.

We secured this year as our speaker, Asa Steel a man of rare literary ability, who was a descendant of John Hall who lived with Paine in this city in the house of Capt. Colteman and who made the models of Paine's Bridge—whose diary is full of notes relating to Paine and his distinguished visitors, which shows that he had many friends.

I would be glad to have the names of any lovers of Paine who are in sympathy with our views, and any one who desires this portrait of Paine for their albums, or as a souvenir of the ingratitude of the people of Philadelphia in objecting to Paine's portrait on the walls of the hall he helped to create and without whose efforts the portrait of Washington might have been burnt in effegy—can have the same by sending a stamp and their address to J. B. Elliott, 3515 Wallace St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Special Exhibition

The Denton Collection of Butterflies. Gold medal award at the recent Exposition Universelle, Paris. Albert Rouillier's Art Rooms, 203 Michigan Boulevard, Fine Arts Building, Chicago, February 11 to 23. Admission free.

Five hundred butterflies on exhibition, principally from tropical countries. They are mounted on the "Denton Mount" which does away with the pin and protects them from destructive insects, dust, etc.

William Denton, Jr., son of the noted naturalist, freethinker and scientist, Wm. Denton, is in charge of the Exhibition, and will be glad to make the acquaintance of social radicals who may visit the art rooms.

Friends who wish to call on us may take Lake St. Elevated to Ashland Ave. Walk one block east and one north to 500 Fulton. The Fulton St. electric cars pass our door. The Paulina St. electric, which transfers from east and west bound cars, passes one block west of us. Out of town readers, as well as those living in the city, are cordially invited to call.

Mill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in avor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

'The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents.

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages. 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Paper covers 50 cents, Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul, "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN
AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition togetner with the startling letters of "Louise Muyen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. By E. C. Walker. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"A WOMAN in order to live the purest life, must be FREE, must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially."—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD," by Henry Olerich. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 4 0 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy Price $1. For sale at this office.

Freethought Ideal, Edited by Etta Semple, is published fort-nightly at Ottawa, Kansas. It is the only atheistic paper in the world edited and published by a woman. Fifty cents per year. Samples free.

DO YOU EVER THINK

Of the fate of the Prodigal Daughter? The Prodigal Son is forgiven and received with rejoicing—why should different treatment be accorded to his sister? For a vivid, true picture of the conditions in homes and factories which produce thousands of so-called fallen women every year, read "The Prodigal Daughter; or, The Price of Virtue," by Rachel Campbell. Price, 25 cents.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

By Grant Allen. "The Old Asceticism said: 'Be Virtuous and You Will Be Happy.' The New Hedonism says: 'Be Happy and You Will Be Virtuous.'" This is the key note of Grant Allen's Masterpiece. 30 large pages, five cents For sale at this office.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo. 172 pages. Price 25 cents.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint: A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution, its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents; for sale at this office.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. B. Foote's time-tried handbook, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., NO. 6. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, FEB. 23, E. M. 301. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE NO. 853.

Thoughts and Deeds.

Life's more than breath and the quick round of blood.
It is a great spirit and a busy heart;
The coward and the small in soul scarce do live.
One generous feeling—one great thought—one deed
Of good, ere night, would make life longer seem
Than if each year might number a thousand days—
Spent as is this by nations of mankind.
We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We should count time by heart throbs.
He most lives
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

Period Pointers.

BY C. L. JAMES.

The twentieth century appears to have come in with actual materialization of the sex revolution. The last "Atlantic Monthly"—that magazine whose publishers quailed before Comstock, some twenty years ago, as though the "Times" or "Quarterly" would be dictated to by a Scotland Yard informer—produces an article worthy a place in Lucifer (except that it is too long), upon the absurdity of not teaching children about sex.

Almost simultaneously, I read the most advanced free love news are calmly discussed by the Woman's branch of the Society for Ethical Culture (respectable); that Pilgrim Hall, Boston, cradle of that great Puritanical Inconsistency, whose martyr spirit forever looks forward, and its Bibliolatry, like the other face of Janus, back, has witnessed a meeting, "mostly of women," to demand sexual physiology be taught in the public schools. Last, not least, Frederica de l'Espinasse shows that Iowa actually has added this branch of knowledge to the curriculum.

These things, taken together, must mean that the jam has broken at last; the logs of sex-superstition are off down stream; and we pioneers may be hunting a job of some sort which has not yet become respectable.

Ever since woman began to work regularly for wages, it was clear to some that a sex-revolution impended, and could not stop short of their complete emancipation. Since they began to claim civil rights, the alarm has been general; and most alleged liberals have been principally occupied in proving they did not want a perfectly clean sweep, only to scrub things streaky, as it were.

For about ten years past, it has been generally recognized that the New Woman has come to stay; and conservatism was fain to hope she would be satisfied with existence—like the poor Indian. But if sex has got to be made matter of common school teaching, the jig's up. It always was an open secret that no law, custom, stignette, punctilio, or institution of any sort which the past has associated with this relation, will bear scientific scrutiny. That's why the subject has always been taboo

A correspondent asks if it be a fact that looking with a telescope at an object gone below the horizon will cause it to reappear? Of course not. Ten thousand seamen try the experiment every day. What the Koreshanites are befogged by, is that the lower part of a ship or other distant object may disappear before it goes below the horizon. If this phenomenon be due to interference of mists, waves, grass, irregularities of the earth's surface, etc., the telescope by making outlines plainer, may restore the hull etc., to sight. But though the hull is much larger than the top sail, no telescope will enable one to see it as far as he can see the topsail without any.

The hideous Bosschieter murder-case has come and gone, and been almost forgotten. The four young men whom it buried alive, appear, though their actual crime was "Collective," to have been, criminalogically about the "Habitual" grade; which is incurable, and in cases like theirs, dangerous. They were rich "sports" who had ceased to find common vice sufficiently spicy—had become epicures and experimentalists in sex-perversion, exhibited the hereditary "sadistic" quality in the hopeless criminal degree. They are, therefore, well where they are. But they won't stay there. Dollars and cents which procured ministers to plead for them even in face of public indignation, will get them out when this hysterical passion has subsided. Poor niggers would have been left to it, and burnt, with the result of making other sadists. Scientific information, to effect that every true sadist needs permanent restraint, from his own point of view quite as much as other people's, would prevent both evils. Such information as the editor of the "Dispatch" spent two years in Joliet for printing, might have saved these fellows' victim. But if it made sin easier to avoid, it might also make sin easier to commit.

Law'norder produces a remarkable kind of logic. Its fundamental syllogism may be stated thus: "Men are bad—therefore they should have power." Very similar is this other. "Obscene publications facilitate vice—it makes no difference that they hinder crime."

Is it "Science"?

BY C. F. HUNT.

Miss Karla Z. Chuboda, a public school teacher of New York, tells of her conversion to Christian Science, and her rejection of that belief, in the "Chicago American" of Feb. 11, 1901. Portions of her story might have been taken from Eugene Sue's condemnation of the Jesuits. She concludes as follows:

"The much-vaunted charity I had by this time discovered was only a theory, pabulum for beginners.

"To the enlightened there was no such thing as sympathy, charity, affection.

JESUS A CATCHWORD.

"'Be self-centered' is the real teaching. Egoism of the most hideous aspect is the true creed [of these people.] Jesus is only a catchword, and no ties, human or divine, are held sacred when they come in conflict with the interests of the church.

"Mrs. Eddy, the founder of the sect, is regarded as the reincarnation of Christ. Her word is absolute law.

"'If I were ordered by Mrs. Eddy to go to the ends of the earth on my head I would do so,' says Mrs. Stetson to those whom she instructs in the virtue of obedience.

"I was engaged to a very estimable young man. My heart was his. But he was opposed to the Christian Science. My love for him was accordingly 'treated' as if it had been a sickness. I was simply hypnotized to regard my intended with indifference, and while under this spell I broke off the engagement.

SWEETHEARTS ARE SEPARATED.

"When I came to my senses it was too late. He had left the country broken-hearted, I was told, and I do not hesitate to say that my heart, too, was well-nigh broken.

"Marriage is not looked upon favorably by Christian Science, and when it is pointed out that Mrs. Eddy has been married four times the reply is:

"'Oh, she, as the wayshower, must go through all the experiences of the material world to show others how to avoid them.' I became thoroughly disgusted with the hollowness and hypocrisy, the downright lying of the Christian Science professions and quit them.

"But my search for truth has not ceased. I am now studying the Vedanta, and I believe my thirst for truth will be slaked there.

"One thing I had almost forgotten to tell. When I was sent forth to make converts for Christian Science I was told:

"'Never bring anybody into this church unless he is at least fairly prosperous.'

"And that this is the general rule is attested by the fact that the Christian Science churches have none who are destitute."

Christian Scientists resemble orthodox Christians in the matter of repudiation of the rules of reason. They, therefore, have no right to the term "scientist." "Voicing the Truth" with them means denial of the most patent facts. They deny the existence of disease, yet claim to cure it. I have seen persons who, I thought, were aiming to improve society on lines of pure reason, suddenly change under the spell of this queer doctrine, and not only ignore objections based on reason, but make a virtue of doing so, assuming an air of condescending toleration of the unfortunate people they have left in the benighted realm of logic. I have seen them appear triumphant after "treating" ailments which were certain to disappear exactly as they actually did, having run their course. I have also seen them fail to help chronic ailments, and patients are known to die, fail, improve or recover, just as millions of other like cases have done in the absence of such "treatment."

"The blood is the life," and any power of the mind over disease depends upon a quickening of the circulation. Any one can recall a case where a patient seems "better" after an excitement such as fear, pleasure or suspense, and recovery may or may not follow, depending upon the reaction. It may not encourage these "scientists" to reflect that a drink of strong liquor would have a similar effect.

There is no such thing as cure of disease; there is only recovery by natural laws which are never idle where disease exists, yet these people boast as though sickness were a fixture in the body until driven out by their incantations.

In "Feminine News and Views," in the "New York Evening Sun," this question is asked by a correspondent: "If a young woman asks a man to act as her escort to a place of amusement, should she not provide the tickets?" And this is the answer given: "She should provide not only the tickets but a chaperone." And, pray, for whose protection is the chaperone? The man's, the woman's, or that of the editor of the "Feminine News and Views" column of the "Evening Sun"? Of the three, the last named stands in much the greatest need of a guardian.—Brann's Iconoclast.

To Prevent Wife Beating.

"The Senate has passed a bill providing for corporal punishment for wife-beaters. The advocates of the whipping post for these offenders, leaving aside for the moment the question as to whether the whipping post can be defended as a mode of punishment, lose sight of one important fact; that the severity of the punishment will defeat its object. Even at the present time, it is difficult to get a wife to testify against a brutal husband, especially the kind of woman most in need of protection; the shame of publicity, especially if there be children, inducing a woman to long endure harsh treatment. The tendency of a severer and more degrading punishment will be to make the more refined women even more reluctant to complain.

"And let legislators remember, that their efforts to protect women from brutal husbands are a pitiful farce so long as the statutes and common laws continue which condemn married women to a subordinate position in the family. Will not a woman hesitate long before complaining when she knows that if her complaint for any reason is dismissed she is committed back to the tender mercies of the man she has just had in court; or even if he be sentenced, at its expiration she is again subject to his cruelties? For divorces are not for the poor. And if there be children, their custody except in rare cases remains vested in the husband.

"But even stronger than the law is the pressure of economic conditions. A woman with young children is seriously handicapped in earning a living, and it is often the fear of seeing her children hungry that will induce a wife to endure brutality so long as they are fed. When legislators recognize these two facts, and open opportunities to employment to that even a woman with children can easily make a living, or that her friends will be able, as now they often are not, to help her; and remove the legal disparity between the sexes, the question of preventing wife beating will be solved by the wives. It cannot be settled before, and it cannot be settled by anyone else."—Justice, Wilmington, Del.

Pretty good. But "Justice" might have said more and not have said too much. It is not merely that the law condemns woman to "a subordinate position in the family" but that law and sentiment condemn her to the family. Why should she be forced to live with a man from whom the whipping post must be invoked to protect her? Along with equality in the family and economic betterment must go freedom of divorce, for rich and poor. But still we have not got to the bottom. The mind must be freed. Sexual superstition, like fashion, enslaves its millions. Multitudes of women who could secure divorce do not do so because they are steeped in ignorance of the essential equities and moralities. They need enlightenment as badly as other multitudes need money; millions need both enlightenment and money. "Justice" has thrown a strong light on the whipping post as an asserted cure for marital ills, but its light does not cover enough ground; moral emancipation must go hand in hand with industrial emancipation. W.

Too Much Law.

Robert Schilling, in "National Advance," Milwaukee, Wis.

A Beloit judge has ignored the marriage law which requires a few days' delay for a marriage after a license has been procured. A similar fate awaits the law that proposes to have a prospective couple submit to an examination by a board of physicians before being legally married. If people would only realize that proper education and training will do more to make men and women better than all the fool laws have ever done, the world would be the better for it.

The world is governed too much now, and "the country that is least governed is best governed," as Thomas Paine said over a hundred years ago.

The laws framed to protect religion were based on a superstitious belief that an offender of the gods might bring down wrath on the whole community.—Moncure D. Conway.

Selections from Traubel.

"Conservator."

There is no man all vice or all virtue. There is no saint, no paragon, no summed up good. There is crime but no criminal. There is decency but no saint.

The peanut virtue which wins its heaven by making faces at sin passes the truest play of the game.

No one believes in vice. No one loves vice or takes delight in impurity.

The soul revolts against the law. The law is your straight jacket offered in place of justice.

You cannot solve the problem of crime. Therefore you build jails.

You are provoked to build yourself a stately mansion of earthy pretense based upon a martyrdom of sin. The stock exchange and the bagnio are more nearly at par than quotations affecting either would formally indicate.

You beat down fraternity with the rawhide of your interests and profits and then wonder that men do not love your transgressing ubiquity.

Give manhood a little room to move round in. Confine it, it shatters the near walls of its prison. Then it is lawless. The lawless soul is the soul that asks for a chance to observe the law.

Society everywhere invades me and yet gibbets me the first time I invade it.

I am not trusted to go round the corner. I am policed and priested in market and marriage.

I find all four of my bed posts social monitors and the shoes I wear keep tab on my eccentricities of conduct.

Do you think you can save your cities while your bedlam stock exchange continues to exist? Do you think you can save chastity by driving prostitution round the corner out of sight?

Do you think you can add much to any real moral consensus while you neither birth nor breed your children in atmospheres redolent of universal plenty?

Vice may be hunted from ward to ward across the acres of a city without any reduction of the ratios of its poison.

I do not concede that the girl who sells her body is worse than the tradesman who sells his soul.

It is about all one whether you cohabit for money or whether you turn your soul over to a publisher for hire. I do not excuse either. I grieve for both.

The children must be given a chance to be born with good bodies. And after being born with good bodies they must be guaranteed a chance to maintain those bodies pure. Do you not really know that a tremendous per cent of what is called crime is simply born of the necessity we labor under of eating food and wearing clothes? And this food and these clothes are hard—often impossible—to get. If we cannot get them by fair we seize or sell to get them by foul means. We do not glorify the deed, but we solemnly sanction it with such rude declamation as comes from a man starved of all social opportunity.

The saviors of cities cannot plank themselves across the gutters and imagine that their cities are clean.

You refer to the girls who sell their bodies for money. But is not everything in the metropolis sold for money? We have the money habit. We speak of the worth of a man in the terms of money. We measure the actor up against the box office. We measure the writer in terms of editions. The girl marries well if she marries money.

Of all tyrannies that tyranny is worse which plays its knuckles part against the derelict. Good sirs, you rub your virtues into us with a rough palm.

The very first
Of human life must spring from woman's breast;
Your first small words are taught you from her lips,
Your first tears quench'd by her, and your last sighs
Too often breathed out in a woman's bosom,
When men have shrunk from the ignoble care
Of watching the last hours of him who fed them.

A Chambermaid's Diary.

Rarely does one find a story written naturally from life and without falsehood. Rarely do the real working people get much of their experiences into print.

The book named above may count for thousands of silent complaints. It tells the sorrows of the hired girl. It shows the impossibility of honest lives in a false an artificial society, divided into master and servant, mistress and maid. How unhappy, dull and wasting are both ends of the forced compact for a means of living to the one, dignity or position to the other. Octave Mirbeau is the author, and Benj. R. Tucker, of New York, the translator and American publisher of "A Chambermaid's Diary." Though the translator has had to suppress some portion of the original, he makes good use of the occasion, offering his apology: "Let me explain that the men whose ugly souls your Celestine does not hesitate to lay bare are types, to a greater or less extent, of most of the men whom we place in our halls of legislation to make our laws, in our halls of administration to execute them, and in our halls of so-called justice to interpret and enforce them, and that among the laws which they have made are some, aimed ostensibly at the suppression of obscene literature, that are really intended to protect from exposure their own obscene lives and those of others of their ilk, and to protect from attack the social evils and political institutions on which they thrive."

And he goes on to explain the little game of the human beasts. This is especially interesting to American women who are beginning to understand the deception practiced upon them, and the readers of Lucifer will find the apology a very good introduction to a very readable and interesting book.

What should be the experience of a young woman bundled about from place to place not merely to look for a living but to bear the ill-temper of her mistress and exposed to the seductive artifices of their husbands and sons?

No one can read it and think of a remedy for the evil it depicts, if he does not think of doing away with the foundations of the classes of master and servant, so that instead of these, divided by a gulf, of "property," each one may be able to live independent of the patronage of another and all may as naturally find it to their advantage to render service as to receive service. But the book is the work of a good story-teller, consequently it is not burdened with a formal moral. Pages 457. Price paper 50 cents.—S. W.

Why Such Discrimination?

Stephen Bell in "Justice"

The Paterson miscreants who murdered Jennie Bosschieter have been tried, found guilty of murder in the second degree and are safely out of the way for a good many years. It is well. Imagination recoils from picturing what would have happened had black men committed that crime. That the perpetrators would have been lynched goes without saying, and the remainder of the negro population would have in all probability been materially diminished. It would have proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that all negroes are congenital fiends and that they deserve to be swept off the face of the earth. Why the existing facts do not prove the same thing of all white men I leave to the "nigger-burners" for solution.

Plain Words.

The woman question is very much in evidence and the extreme conclusions arrived at by some have a tendency to render it obnoxious, particularly to such as view it only from the surface. As a sort of tonic, "Plain Words on the Woman Question" by Grant Allen with remarks by E. C. Walker, No. 9 of the Light-Bearer Library published by M. Harman, 300 Fulton Street, Chicago, Ill., ought to be read with pleasure and profit. The writer makes it startlingly prominent that the continuance of the race depends on continued reproduction. In other words we are confronted with a "condition and not a theory" as Cleveland once said. The price of this little magazine is but five cents.—Bayonne (N. J.) "Standard."

George D. Herron and His Critics.

Since January 6 this well-known socialistic reformer has been lecturing every Sunday afternoon to large and very enthusiastic audiences at Central Music Hall in this city. The object of these lectures appears to be to persuade people to adopt what he calls the "idea of Jesus" as their rule of life. Treating this popular propagandist as I should myself wish to be treated I quote a few characteristic paragraphs from his last Sunday's lecture entitled "The Economic Goal of the Will to Love," as reported in Monday's "Chicago Record:"

Jesus was not a Christian, according to any common usage of that term; he was something infinitely more than that. Nor is it correct to speak of Jesus as a socialist. He was something infinitely more radical than that also. If we were obliged to speak of him and his ideas in our modern sociological terms, we should have to call him a communist; that is as near as we come to a definition. Yet his was a communism that extends through the whole range of being. It takes in both the economic and spiritual life, and everything else that life is.

My insistence on socialism is not that it fulfills the idea of Jesus, but that it will have to come first in order for his idea to have ground to stand upon, or find a working basis of social fact from which to appeal to the common faith. Socialism is a world movement in the direction of the kingdom of heaven. The socialistic society must precede communism and its free individuality, just as the foundation must precede the building, or the plant precede the blossom. We can at last come to liberty only out of the socialistic experience of labor association and economic unity; only by socialistically learning how to all work together for the good of all, and for the joy and free individuality of each.

NATURE PROVIDENTIAL.

Taking up now the communistic idea of Jesus, it is well for us to consider first how he always appealed to nature for its justification. Nature is providential in its resources and communistic in its processes, and from the plain facts of nature Jesus argued to the fatherliness and communistic self giving of God, or the spirit within nature. It makes no difference to the sun whether it warms a poor man or a rich man, a beggar man or a thief; it does not discriminate between the orthodox and unorthodox, the good and the evil; the sun distributes its life and warmth by an all-inclusive and non-exclusive communism. And this is the way God acts, the way the universe acts.

I have listened to a number of these Sunday afternoon lectures and have found them very interesting, both as to matter and manner. Mr. Herron—"Professor" Herron as he is commonly called, iterates and re-iterates the statement that "socialism is a road, not a goal." That the goal to which socialism leads, is the "free individuality of each" human being. In its last and logical analysis there seems no difference between the teachings of Herron and those of the "communist-anarchists." In fact I think the definitions of his ideal man, Jesus, are in almost the exact language of anarchist-communism. He frequently tells his hearers, in effect at least, that we must not stop with the Jesus of the "Synoptic Gospels," but should reach out for something still higher and better. He tells us very distinctly that no man and no god is good enough or wise enough to follow as authority. That "to be merely obedient to authority is to have the soul of a slave." That "authority has always been truth's deadly enemy; never its protection. Authority is truth's tomb," etc.

In the first lecture of the present course he used this language, as reported by the daily press:

THE SOIL MUST BE REMOVED.

Deeper than the capitalistic system is the false thought of life in which it is rooted. Not only must the system be uprooted, but the soil that sustains it must be removed. That soil is the thought that it is necessary for some people to use and rule other people, either for the good of the ruled or for the good of the ruling class. Our whole civilization and culture are built out of the various forms of private property in man. The capitalistic system is merely the enforcement of this world system of human ownership

A WORLD OF HARD DRIVEN SLAVES.

Let us not be deceived by academic and ruling class notions of liberty. We are not free. The meaning of liberty has scarcely dawned upon us. We are, on the whole, a world of hard-driven and perpetually frightened slaves whose best manners are still in the cringing state and whose religious teachings are thoroughly servile, in source and effects. Whether it be labor of hand or mind, it is labor done under some kind of lash or menace, some kind of fear or coercion. The labor of the world has love at its heart, but it has a slave-built civilization on its back and the slave fear in its soul. Our thoughts are the thoughts of slaves and our deeds are the deeds of slaves and we pray the prayer of slaves and we breathe the air of slaves.

SELF-OWNERSHIP THE SUBSTANCE OF ALL LIBERTY.

The economic, religious and political crises are all one and their solution must be one. These crises alike proceed from the increasingly determined and intelligent struggle of man for the possession and direction of his own life, for that self-ownership, which is the soil and substance of all liberty.

THE TRUE HOLY BIBLE.

We ourselves are the true holy bible—the unending scripture of heroic daily common life. Deeper than man's slave history, at the heart of his slave labor is the divine presence of the eternal will to be free. As the knowledge of who and what he is increases man learns how surely his own freedom must be his own achievement. No master can hand down freedom to the people. By their own faith must life and labor purity themselves from the marks of slavery.

THE GODS ARE DEAD BUT MAN LIVES.

The new religion must gather into one liberating meaning and purpose the detailed works and facts of life and let these be its faith and sacraments. We do not need to look into the heavens to find God. We need not implore the skies for strength or hunt the mysteries for wisdom, for the human individual is the divinest and wisest force. The gods of the priest and politicians are dead, but on the social horizon breaks the day of the unfearing average man, who stands upon his own divinity while he brings forth lovely and heroic deeds out of the workshop of ordinary experience and moves out to disclose his own free individuality as the final and wonderful reality of the universe.

BUILDS UPON THE DEVIL, AUTHORITY.

The orthodox church builds upon that devil, authority, which Jesus sought to destroy, and the church is the chief teacher and exemplar of supreme immorality.

A few nights since I went to hear J. Stitt Wilson, one of the five leading evangelists of the "social crusade" in Chicago, who was advertised to speak at the "Chicago Single-Tax Club." The speaker failed to appear, but the time was occupied by Mr. Moehle and others in criticizing the Herron movement. The chief point in these criticisms seemed to be that Mr. Herron and his friends were not practical reformers; that they dealt in glittering generalities but formulated no plans whereby the "Kingdom of Heaven," the reign of Love, Brotherhood and Justice, could be practicalized; whereas the single-taxers were working on practical lines for results that are even now possible of attainment. These anti-Herron arguments were presented with much earnestness and plausibility and were listened to by perhaps two hundred persons—a small audience as compared to the multitudes that weekly hang with almost breathless attention upon the utterances of the chief apostle of the modern "Jesus Idea;" which idea, by the way, seems to be much like the lover's idea of his beloved one, something incomparably better and higher than the plain facts warrant or justify.

But now a new and, presumably, a far more formidable opponent of this social crusade has taken up the cudgels—the HATCHET, perhaps I should say! Side by side with the report of the last lecture of Mr. Herron is a carefully written column article by John V. Farwell, one of Chicago's millionaire merchants, and leader in political and civic affairs of the great city. Under the head "Prof. Herron's New Church," Mr. Farwell undertakes to show, by serious argument and by ridicule, that there is no need of any such new church, and moreover that the tendency of such teachings would be to bring world-wide disaster. This defence of the capitalistic social, political and religious systems closes in these words:

Meanwhile we can all learn one of the commandments. "Thou shalt not covet" other men's possessions, with great profit to individual character. Coveting other men's brains and capturing them by the necromancy of such socialistic sophistry is so much worse than coveting one's ox or his ass that it cannot be described in human language. There is no excuse for deliberate deception as to what men can do to escape from business or political ends.

The fact that the Herron lecture course has put the champions of the old systems on the defensive, and that they accept the challenge of newspaper discussion is a hopeful sign of the times. Also that the great dailies—all of which are believed to be owned by capitalists and conducted in the interest of the rich, the conservative, the conventional, the established, and therefore opposed to all radical innovations—that these papers open their columns to reports and discussions such as these, is another suggestive and hopeful sign that discontent with the old and desire for something better is becoming so pronounced and wide-spread that public journalism can no longer ignore its existence.

M. H.

Do not flatter yourself that friendship authorizes you to say disagreeable things to your intimates. On the contrary, the closer are your relations with a person the more necessary do tact and courtesy become.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

The Sex Revolution.

C. L. James—see first page of this issue—thinks the "sex revolution" already an accomplished fact, and gives some reasons for so thinking. That our correspondent did not mention all, or the half, of the pointers showing that the said revolution is really here we have only to read the current news and listen to the platform lectures of the various reform clubs, especially in our larger towns and cities.

Even the pulpit, the least progressive and last to change, of all our educational institutions, has been invaded by the revolutionary spirit, as attested by a sermon preached by Mrs. Roberts, wife of Dr. J. E. Roberts of the "Church of this World," a very popular clergyman of Kansas City, Mo. This Rev. Dr. Roberts does not accept the dictum of Saul of Tarsus, otherwise called Paul, that women should "keep silence in the churches," and so, during his occasional absences his pulpit is filled by his wife.

On a recent Sunday Mrs. Roberts preached a sermon on marriage and divorce in which she took the ground that Marriage is simply a contract with which religion has nothing to do, and should be dissolved by mutual agreement.

In all cases of mutual agreement the courts should have the right simply to witness the transaction and put it on record.

When forced to recognize marriage as a failure is it not barbarous to compel the perpetuation of that union?

The State has no more right to dictate when people shall marry than to say when a bankrupt shall begin business again.

These paragraphs are characteristic of the entire discourse, which was listened to with deep and unflagging interest to the close, by her large and very intelligent audience. If in every town and city a few intelligent women could and would emulate the example of Mrs. Roberts they would practicalize the most radical and far-reaching of all the revolutions known to the race since man emerged from primitive barbarism or savagery.

The Story of Stumbling.

BY LUNA HUTCHINSON.

All the reforms of the present day are blocked by the bible and its wrong interpreters. Every idea advanced is met by the question: Is it according to scripture? Not, is it in accordance with facts? But the time has come, when facts are to give testimony, instead of fiction and tradition. When the question is asked, if the union of a man and woman, pronounced man and wife by the words, "so long as you both shall live," Is it the truest and best form of marriage law? The bible is brought forward to confirm it to be so; when the experience of all times proves it to be false and a libel upon human nature. Those who are united by anything else than love or soul affinity, can by no human laws be truly married or united, and such ties can never bind two together for life, they attain the full development of mental growth. The word should be changed to love, and this be the only solution of marriage ties, and the one and most important question in divorce "Do you both now love?"

This word live, only needs changing one letter, to make the i an o, and the stone of offense and rock of stumbling would be removed from the pathway of married life. "Blest be the tie that binds;" but the tombs of millions of dead loves and blasted lives, have been shut up and hidden from the world by the wrong idea that man could make laws to govern this greatest power of soul-life, which controls the whole universe of matter and of mind.

Double Stars

"Chicago American"

Vast spaces in the universe are inhabited by complicated creations known as double stars. This earth also is populated by double stars, each double creation consisting of one man and one woman. The fact that the man revolves around the woman proves that she is the greater creation in the human double star arrangement.

The very young man looks forward, as the very old man—except the happily married—looks backward, to existence with some woman.

Every contented man finds life tolerable because somewhere in creation, near or distant, there exists a woman who is to him what the sun is to the planet.

"Without woman the beginning of life would be helpless, the middle of life without pleasure, and the end without consolation."

We may add that without women newspapers would be dull, books and plays without plots, life without surprises and death as free from sting as any gentle butterfly.

Men deceive themselves as to their own importance on this earth.

The really important thing is woman. Nothing interests us seriously unless a woman is involved.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

So long as mankind shall continue to bestow more liberal applause on their destroyers than on their benefactors, the thirst for military glory will ever be the vice of the most exalted characters.—Gibbon.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Sam Hauptli, Calif.:—Enclosed I send three dollars; one for "Hilda's Home;" one for back dues on Lucifer, and one more to pay for another year. Send me "Karezza" and I will remit. Have been absent in the Klondyke, since '98, and don't know who got my paper during my absence. I should have written you from Dawson, when my subscription expired.

[Glad to hear from Friend Haupth, after his long sojourn in the frozen North, and glad to know that he is willing to pay back dues on Lucifer notwithstanding he did not receive the paper. If he had notified us of his change of address we should have freely made the required change. M. H.]

Ralph C. Clyde, Portland, Ore.:—Enclosed you will find the names of five new subscribers and the amount of their subscription. The balance is for the books you left with me. Disposed of nearly all of them. Would make a suggestion to you that I believe is a good one. When sending sample copies it would be advisable to enclose a trial offer subscription blank of the thirteen weeks offer. Just before the thirteen weeks are up send them permanent subscription blanks, as by that time they will thoroughly understand the noble teachings and will undoubtedly become steady subscribers, for I cannot understand how they would do without it. All the subscribers in Portland are well pleased with the Morning Star and are recommending it to all their friends.

M, C., Calif.:—I am a Lucifer woman, but my friends are all opposed; so I read my friend's paper, paying half, as she otherwise could not take it. I write now because I am much concerned in regard to another Lucifer woman and her husband. You send her the paper gratis, as I understand. They are in dire want, in great distress, and if not relieved will not remain long on this side of life. If they could get to Home, Washington, where they could have an acre of land, free wood and a garden, with his small soldier's pension they could get along. They are now in Los Angeles, Calif., both too ill to work. Can, or will, any of our friends help them? They do not know, and I shall not tell them, that I am writing this to you. Twenty dollars would, on a pinch, take them through the quarter. Now, friends, these people are worthy. They are faithful workers for the good cause we all have at heart—when they are able. Their names are Sadie A. and W. P. Magoon, Station A, Los Angeles Cal. I leave it to you whether to put their names in the paper or not. My own name I give you but not for publication, on account of my family.

[Many of our readers will recall the names of Sadie A. and W. P. Magoon, as former contributors to these columns. They have been readers of and co-workers with Lutifer for more than a dozen years. That they should be left to suffer and die for lack of the common necessaries of life would be a sad reflection, not to say a very serious indictment against the liberality, the humanity, of our well-to-do reform workers. If any of our readers feel that they can afford to do anything for this worthy and needy couple, Lucifer's office will receive what they are willing to give and will see that it reaches the right destination, and is properly credited to the donors. "In the good old days children had a father and mother, but divorce changes all that."

In the good To-day there are children who are better off than that, all as a result of divorce. They have two fathers and two mothers and love 'em all. THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in avor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

'The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents.

What The Young Need to Know: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages, 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages. 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Paper covers 50 cents, Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul, "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters, Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A newedition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. By E. C. Walker. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"A WOMAN in order to live the purest life, must be FREE, must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially."—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD," by Henry Olerich. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 4 0 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy Price $1. For sale at this office.

Freethought Ideal, Edited by Etta Semple, is published fort-nightly at Ottawa, Kansas. It is the only atheistic paper in the world edited and published by a woman. Fifty cents per year. Samples free.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gliders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

By Grant Allen. "The Old Asceticism said: 'Be Virtuous and You Will Be Happy.' The New Hedonism says: 'Be Happy and You Will Be Virtuous.'" This is the key note of Grant Allen's Masterpiece. 30 large pages, five cents For sale at this office.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., No. 7. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, MARCH 2, E. M. 301. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE No. 854.

Lais.

Is the flame but of shame that dances and dies
In the pleading depths of thy childish eyes?
Are the serpents of sin but asleep in the lair
Thou hast twined for them here in thy radiant hair?
Is it blood of thy victims that ripples and drips
Through roses of ruin to laugh on thy lips?
What strange, sweet presence of evil is thine,
Thus dainty and deadly, oh, sister of mine?

While our virtues but reign among virtues dethroned.
And the rod forborne, and the crime condoned,
And the sin, and the tear, and the rain, and the flowers
But make up the sum of this being of ours:
What terrors have seized thee—what ills beyond prayer,
Oh, Priestess of Sorrow, of raiment so rare—
That naught may atone for this sweet sin of thine,
Though bitter the penance be, sister of mine?

Thou wert artless the storms of hot pulses to shun,
When Love and her sister embraced and were one,
And the woman of Thessaly, casting her stone,
Wears the scorn of thy guilt as a screen for her own:
Yet thy kiss betrayed womanhood shameth its foe
In the crust thou hast shared with thy sister in woe—
In the pearls of sweet pity and patience that shine
Through the wreck of thy purity, sister of mine.

Lo, a bud may be bruised, yet the spring is not done,
And the day does not die for a spot on the sun,
And the penitent prayer and the chastening tear
Are but frozen to hate by the ceaseless sneer!
Oh! the pity of wine into hemlock turned,
And of ill that is borne when the good is spurned,
For the deeps of my being are mirrored in thine,
Thou art near to me, kin to me, sister of mine.

—From the Dead Bird.

Illegitimate.

BY WILLIAM PLATT.

ROOM SCENE. (Mother and son sitting at table. both pretending to read, both anxious.)

Mother: It is sultry. (Pause.)

Mother (very tenderly and quietly). Where have you been this evening, my own son?

Son (laughing cynically): Amusing myself! (Pause.)

Son (with outward calm): I have broken with May Rigby.

Mother (in deep sorrow): Broken with your sweetheart?

Son (bitterly): I said "with May Rigby"! (Pause.)

Mother: Why have you broken with your sweetheart?

Son. You must not ask me that; I cannot say it. (Pause.)

Mother: Your sweetheart had a lover once, a so-called lover; a man who betrayed and deserted her; like an honorable woman she told you this.

Son (bitterly): She told me tonight; that is true.

Mother: And you answered her? (Pause.)

Son: Yes I answered her!

Mother: And you said?

Son: Once is enough—why torture me? (Pause.)

Son: How did you know about it?

Mother: She told me.

Son: She seems fond of telling it. (Pause.)

Mother: When a young girl reaches womanly years, she becomes ringed in with terrible dangers; and the most terrible of all are those which lurk in her own innocence and in the fullness of her own soul.

Son: I don't understand your meaning, Mother.

Mother: Hear me to the end.

Son: I don't know what it is you wish to tell me, or what way it may tend; anyway, words are useless; my course is taken, and I am sick to death, sick to death.

Mother: I do not wish to turn your course in any way;—something I wish to say to you if you will hear it.

Son: I am listening, Mother.

Mother: Terrible dangers lurk in the young girl's innocence and in her own fullness of soul; and yet it were worst of all if they were not innocent, and if their souls had not a rich fullness. But in the time when their lover comes the innocent and full-souled give to him, yes, they give themselves, everything; unless they be more calculating than innocent, their lover may take from them all he asks. It is sad for the woman if the man has not honor.

Son: What of the woman's honor?

Mother: Is it dishonorable to give, however fully and freely? To take may be dishonorable,—to give cannot be. It is the woman who does the giving and the paying for—what does the man pay in such a case? He is not made a thing of shame. His laughter is not embittered.

Son: I do not defend the man: but shall the man take all the blame and the woman none?

Mother: The woman none, my God! Does the woman take none! Does he have to bear the fatherless child? Does he carry it in the womb through months of sickness,—each pang made a hundred-fold more bitter by the dire tragedy of the desertion, each agony out-horrored by the Hell of her lonely secrecy—alone and friendless when all friends should smile; without one kiss on her lips when the lover should kiss, oh so often! The terrible temptations of ghastly unnatural revolting means of tearing away the dread responsibilities; and at the last the darkly-hushed delivery worse than death, entombed from the knowledge of the air, cadaverous, fearing even to moan, bloodless, hideous, hidden even from her own inner soul that dare not look on, while the stricken limbs and straining entrails desperately end the task—the task that love should have so lightened and hallowed! . . . Does not the woman pay?

Son: Yes, but. . . .

Mother (interrupting fiercely): But I have told you nothing of what she pays! It is after the child has come that she pays. She loves the child with a love like a burning furnace—loves him the more because she pays for him in shame and anguish and loneliness and heart-ache; and because he has no father she schemes all she knows and suffers anything for his sake. She has to humble herself and whisper her shame to her parents, and get money for his maintenance. She has, worst trial of all, to part with him for respectability's sake, lest she be cast adrift and have no means to provide for him; this lie to herself and him she consents to in return for the money her parents give her and that she spends on the child. Oh the burning nights that she longs to see him, and the agony of her aching breasts! And the years pass as she lives this lie; and she longs and longs for him, and hates the respectability that parts her from him, and hates the parents that would cut her adrift if she refused to live this lie for respectability's sake; and she longs to cry the truth in the face of all, and say—"I am a mother, and motherhood makes me pure and holy! I despise you and your lies, you men and women of the world!" but she dare not, being a timid woman, and having a child to keep—to keep at the price of her lies and the shame of her lies. And she hates her parents that part her from the child, and she wishes them dead, yes, dead, that she may be with the child and have their money to spend on the child—yes, all that is true as I am a mother! And you men who know not how mothers feel, you dream of vague shadows of women, not flesh and blood, but creatures of air and a dream, and embellished with some fiction of bodiless purity which you love because it contrasts with your own earthy full-fleshed passion; but I, I tell you, we too are of flesh and blood; and when we encourage you in your dreams we but deceive you, because we must have help to get the child whom we always long for, whether we know it or not;—you are strong and can overcome us, but we are frail and must deceive you and encourage you in your delusions;—but when you have us at bay we can confess to you desperately that we are passionate mothers, and can do terrible things when the stress of our hour is upon us!

Son: Mother, what are you saying; is there not virtue in women? have I not seen it in many an honest married woman—shall I not choose such a one? refuse. . . . the other?

Mother: Marry the woman who would give herself freely to you without any lie! be true to her; she loves you! The woman who stays to insist on her bond will stay to calculate the money-value of her married embraces! I know them, these cold respectable ones; they would mock me and I them! The market-price, the highest market-price, that is what they seek for their charms; they know the value of every kiss and every smile. . . . they have mocked me, and I them. . . .

Son: Mother, do I understand. . . . what you meant when you told me always that my father died young. . . and why it was that in my early days I lived apart from you? . . Kiss me on the mouth mother!

(She kisses him. . . . Pause.)

Mother: And what will you write to that woman who came to me, trusted me, told me all her sad, tender story. . . . that woman whom you called sweetheart and kissed on the lips?

Son: What could I write her except that a woman's purity is intense and real beyond the possibility of any man's smirching; that her motherhood is holy, and the thrill of her breast is sacred beyond even the power of God to gainsay—that I love her and would fain have her if she could still love me.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

Jealousy, "Fallen" Women, and Marriage.

In another column D. Webster Groh suggests the organization of a Press-Writer's Club. We frequently receive papers containing communications by Lucifer's subscribers and much effective work is doubtless done by them. A friend of Lucifer in the Antipodes has recently taken part in a discussion of the marriage question in the columns of "Mornlag," of Adelaide, South Australia. The following are paragraphs from one of her able articles:

"'Barley Wine' speaks of Othello. 'Deep down in most men,' he says, 'is a sleeping Othello.' Tennyson hints at a sleeping or latent ape and tiger also, but advises us to let them die. Why should latent jealousy have a sop thrown to it, any more than latent cruelty or latent vice of any kind? Let people learn to grow ashamed of jealousy. The Bible says 'jealousy is cruel as the grave.' How then can jealousy be any part of love? It is a great mistake to think it is. But marriage does not exorcise the demon of jealousy by any means. There are plenty of jealous husbands as well as jealous lovers. 'Barley Wine' supposes that in a state of greater freedom, 'instead of a peaceful-minded community, following business, science, and art, we should have liaisons, jealousy, and violence.' I would ask him, have we not these now? Sometimes, considering the shocking state of corruption and vice that is co-existent with marriage, I have wondered if things could be worse in freedom. Grant Allen plainly shows that marriage and prostitution are inseparable, that is, taking the whole community. So also does Mr. Lilly, who quotes Mr. Lecky in support of the contention that it is to the existence of the immoral woman that other women, even in sheltered homes, are enabled to maintain their required standard of purity. 'This idea,' says Mr. Lilly, 'was held by St. Augustine 1400 hundred years ago, and is still more true now than then.' The obvious conclusion then is that the so-called morality of society is founded upon immorality—or at least cannot continue without it. When we consider that hundreds of thousands of women every year die in misery, suffering, and shame solely as the result of their unnatural lives as prostitutes, we may begin to ask could things be much worse under a state of no marriage at all? There would, at any rate, be no proscribed class then. Why should there, in the nature of things, be a section of women in the community set apart and degraded and called 'fallen' women, for acts in which men also have part—when we never hear of 'fallen' men? It is because society forces these women to assume this hideous and unnatural life, by shutting out from them all other means of livlihood, except the very hardest, and for one tumble or so-called 'fall' compels an 'unfortunate' to remain forever in the mire. We write a good deal of emotional poetry on this subject—but we need to acquire a stronger sense of common humanity and justice, it seems to me, and put it into practical execution in our general conduct.

"Will it be believed that Mr. Lilly, in the same article ('The Problem of Purity,' 'New Review,' Jan., 1895) in which he contends for the necessity of the existence of the social evil, yet says no pity should be extended to a woman who is guilty of a lapse from purity! 'We must uphold,' he says, 'in all its severity, the Christian idea of purity. In whatever degree you tamper with that ideal and derogate from its strictness, you demoralise woman, you degrade the ethical tone of society, which depends upon her as the guardian and priestess of chastity. . . . We must reject, as utterly invalid, all excuses for the breach of it; especially the excuse so often urged on the ground of the weakness of women. But while vindicating the inexorable and indefeasible claims of conscience, and of the moral law and the free-will which is the very condition of moral responsibility, we must not, as men of the world, shut our eyes to the facts of life.'

"What are we to think of the moral perception of a man who can strenuously insist upon a strictly Christian ideal of purity, and at the same time believe that the existence of a scorned and depraved class is necessary for the maintaining of that purity! What is left to us but to sorrowfully conclude that the truly Christian idea of a scapegoat necessary for the sins of the people is so firmly rooted in his mind that it has perverted any natural ideas of justice! Moreover it is certain that the ideal of purity Mr. Lilly so strongly advocates must be taken for granted as applying to women only, as Mr. Lilly in the same article urges the measures known as the Contagious Diseases Acts.

"Now, I ask, would not any true woman, on reading the statements of Mr. Lilly, and Mr. Lecky also (latter's most eloquent, most touching, and quite famous passage concerning the 'fallen' woman, whom he denominates 'the most efficient guardian of virtue'), if she believed them to be true, feel moved to the quick, and demand mentally to take her place by the side of her scarred and blackened sister, so sorely wounded in Life's fearful battle! Would she, could she, go on the same, feeling that she was shielded from the cruel arrows of sensuality only by that poor quivering form? I do not overlook the fact that Mr. Lilly guards his position by saying, while human nature is as it is now, we cannot dispense with the social evil, but he quotes St. Augustine to show that it was so 1400 years ago, and he says himself it is no better now. Then I maintain (since we are not responsible for human nature, but only for making the best of it) what is necessary, if it comes to that, must be right. Not that I believe for one moment that, even with our unaltered human nature, the existence of prostitution is necessary or can be defended, and it is not only in connection with this most crying of all evils that we can see weak, indefensible points in our specious modern morality, which beholds in our present rigid marriage laws the summum bonum of all legislation on the question. There are evils within as well as without the marriage contract.

"Laws are only an outgrowth of the people themselves, and need to be continually adjusted to suit our growing requirements. It is evident on all sides that we have long outgrown our cramping bonds of the present marriage system, which makes no allowance for alteration of circumstances caused by accident, illness, varying mental growth, or any other unforeseen occurrence which may cause a change in the feelings of the contracting parties, and for which they are wholly irresponsible.

"'Barley Wine' could not fail to be delighted with the diction and style of the book, and I venture to think the ideas also would commend themselves to him."

Shall We Have Press-Writers' Clubs?

BY D. WEBSTER GROH.

Lucifer has doubtless done an immense amount of good by educating its readers on questions that other papers would not give a hearing, and the only regret is that it reaches so few people; but now that the daily and weekly newspapers are growing sufficiently liberal to admit letters from their readers on almost every topic, Lucifer's readers could increase its power a thousand fold by each one joining the Rationalist Press-Writers' Club and pledging himself to write one letter each week (to some daily or weekly newspaper) based on some article that appeared therein, and commenting thereon in a freethought vein. Editors of these papers would thus gradually be liberalized, even if they did not print the comments, and those that were printed would, in some cases, reach hundreds of thousands of people, where the papers had that number of circulation. Each of Lucifer's readers would thus become an "associate editor" so to speak, of the papers in which he got his letters printed, and aid in forming and controlling public sentiment on the questions he thus elucidated.

These letters should be brief, pointed, courteous and mild, gradually becoming more radical as time rolls on and editors are educated up to publishing them.

The farther they are sent the better, as editors are tempted to publish them to show their readers how far abroad their paper is read and commented on. Nor need the writer be a subscriber or regular reader of the paper, as editors don't know but that he buys it regularly from a news agency, or get it from a friend or otherwise, so that his comments can be gathered from a printed or written extract just as well. So, if Lucifer printed weekly a lot of such extracts appending thereto the name and address of the paper from which they were taken its readers could all write simultaneously to the editor and deluge him with comments and criticisms. Not knowing how or why it was done it would surprise and mystify him, and make him think that Freethought sentiment was rapidly increasing, and induce him to cater more to it and less to superstition in future.

Lucifer's readers can voluntarily do such work without joining the Press-Writers' Association or Club, but as concerted action is more effective, and old writers can give younger ones suggestions, they would better join the Club, which costs nothing whatever.

While each reader would thus be leading some editor to lead his readers farther toward Rationalism, you, Mr. Harman, would be leading your readers in this grand work and be Commander in Chief, and by properly dividing your Press-Writers in several divisions with the understanding that the first divison write the editor of paper from which you printed extract No. 1, Division No. 2, comment on extract No. 2, &c., &c., you could simultaneously direct a score of divisions on a score of papers without any one but those in the secret even suspecting how or what was being done, which would make it extremely effective. Those unacquainted with the Press-Writers' work have no idea what an immense amount of good they are doing. Your readers should by all means join us. Friend P. B. Livesey, Sykesville, Md., gives full particulars to all applicants free of charge.

Respectable Lies and Liars.

"CONSERVATOR."

Your churches are founded upon vice. All respectability finds its origin in the jot and tittle of the alleys. The city rises grim visaged out of ashes of sacrificed beauty. Do you not suspect the system which throws fair women to the dogs in order that you may enjoy your extension of municipal conceit? You have eyes only for the brutal wrong which turns me drunkard. You do not see the subtle wrong which made you gentleman. The gentleman emerges from the sewer. He is saved by a hair. Society finds its choice occupation in making it hard for men to be decent. It keeps one man dirty and gives another a bath and says: "Behold! you have here in epitome all social contrast!"

What a mess you make of honesty. Your honesty. How did you save your primitive honesty from the general wreck? Are you sure you have not acquired some suspected probity in the melee? Are you quite sure your honesty is yours while so many honesties go round looking vainly for masters? What right have you to your virtue while others remain degraded?

You are a rung or two up and you kick off those who attempt to crawl along back of you. You hug the delusion of your safety. You imagine that your house is fireproof and yet you drop these matches on every highway. Do you suppose that your advantages are given you to use? They are given to try you. He who uses them is worse than the man against whom they are used. You hold your virtue in trust. Cloak it in whatever sanctity of seclusion, it rots you root and branch.

You think to save your city by drawing hard and fast lines between its good and bad. Yet go on adding asylums and jails to an already bursting list. You make it impossibly hard for a man to walk straight any given line of conduct. His bread lures him to right and left, down and up, into all avenues of trespass. He could not if he would more than pay lip service to social rectitude. Some day man will give man a chance to be honest. We will then see how much of him let alone would observe the simple laws of life.

I am not concerned to prove that there is enough and too much for all, though both facts could be easily demonstrated, but to demand that those who do the world's work shall have the pay.—Horace L. Traubel.

Marriage Customs of Hebrews and Greeks

Of all the ancient nations, tribes or peoples who have made their impress upon the laws and social customs of the nations of modern Europe and America, it will perhaps be conceded that the Hebrews and the Greeks stand at head of the list. Both Hebrews and Greeks came, probably, from the same original stock—the Phenicians, the builders of Tyre, of Sidon and of Carthage, and who were the most enterprising navigators, merchants artisans and inventors of ancient times, so far as we know.

According to their own records neither Greeks nor Hebrews were monogamous in their conjugal or family relations, in the formative stages of their respective nationalities, and to students of sociology it might be interesting to inquire what relation the marriage customs of these peoples held to the characteristics that gave to the Greeks their pre-eminence in war, in art, in literature, oratory, etc, and that gave to the Hebrews pre-eminence as merchants and financiers.

The basic fact, the most important factor, in human life, is the fact of sex—the differentiation of human beings into the two divisions or halves, female and male. Through and by this differentiation the race is reproduced, from generation to generation, from age to age. What more reasonable, then, than that the manner of treating women—the sex that mainly bears the burden of reproduction, should have much to do with the formation of racial, tribal or national characteristics.

Among modern authors, thinkers and investigators along the lines of sex, reproduction, marriage etc., there is perhaps none whose opinions deserve more respectful attention than do those of the doctors E. B. Foote, of New York, father and son. The works of the elder of these medical gentlemen have been before the public for nearly half a century and have been accorded a very honorable place in the medical hygienic and sociologic literature of the century just closed.

In his lately issued "Home Cyclopedia of Popular Medical, Social and Sexual Science," a work of more than twelve hundred pages, there are nearly four hundred pages devoted to a careful, searching, and apparently candid and unprejudiced examination of the sex question, its manifold relations to human life human happiness and welfare.

In order to treat the question of sex and reproduction in scientific manner it became necessary to examine the marriage customs of all nations and peoples, and particularly of those nations to which we moderns look for examples, or standards of excellence. As already mentioned, it is to the Hebrews and to the Greeks (and their imitators the Romans) more than to any other nations that modern Europeans and Americans look for instruction, for models in social or associative life. In speaking of the marriage customs of the Hebrews Dr. Foote says:

According to the Mosaic law, a man could repudiate his wife for the slightest cause. The wife constituted a part of the estate, and reverted to heirs the same as property. Moses looked upon woman as only an instrument of procreation. Under his laws, polygamy prevailed to a greater extent than in all oriental Asia. In his expedition against the Midianites, an immense number of prisoners were taken, and he directed that every male among the little ones, and that every woman who had known man by lying with him, should be killed, while those female children which had not known man should be kept alive, and be divided among the people, the army, the priests, etc.; and it seems that there were thirty-two thousand women who had not known man. From a humanitarian standpoint all this looks like shocking cruelty and injustice, and so indeed it was; but in justice to Moses, it may be said, that some of his laws were more favorable to women, and it may be that at that age of the world he was kinder to the abused sex than any other ruler.

Much to the same effect is the following paragraph at the close of the section on "Hebrew Polygamy":

"Polygamy," remarks Gide, "was more largely permitted in Judea than in all Eastern Asia; not only was a man permitted to have many lawful wives, but also concubines; and to divorce one he had only to address her a letter of divorcement." Even after the Jews became subject to the Romans, polygamy among them to a considerable extent continued. Herod the Great, if I remember rightly, is said to have had seven wives. Those who had fled to Europe after their dispersion by Titus, A. D. 70, held tenaciously to their customs, including polygamy, as long as they could. According to Maimonides, a distinguished rabbi, the Jews of Europe had a plurality of wives as late as the thirteenth century.

Looking for causes, is it not reasonable to suppose that to the patriarchal and polygamous customs of the Israelites is due the strongly marked individuality of the Hebrews in all the ages of their existence as a distinctive tribe or nation? Cruel and inhuman as was their treatment of women their exceptionally polygamous marriage customs secured the survival of the type represented by the shrewdest and most covetous of the tribe. Jacob, the polygamous father of the heads of the twelve tribes of Israel, swindled his father-in-law out of his flocks and herds by his little game of the peeled rods in the watering troughs, and swindled his brother out of his birthright by taking advantage of Esau's extreme need of food.

And thus it was that the shrewdest and most successful men of the tribe became the fathers of the tribe, and transmitted their own characteristics to the next generation, until, in the course of time, a type was formed so strongly marked that it no longer needed polygamy to make it permanent; and therefore the question may be fairly raised as to whether the Jewish race, with its strongly marked characteristics would now be in existence had the patriarchs, or early founders of that race, been monogamous instead of polygamous in their conjugal relations.

Among the early Greeks, as among all or nearly all ancient nations polygamy prevailed under various forms. Cecrops, one of the earliest lawgivers of Athens, "made it a rule that a man should have but one wife whose children should be regarded as legitimate," but concubinage was allowed to such as could afford it. Quoting again Dr. Foote's Cyclopedia, page 860:

After the lapse of several centuries, however, we find a new feature in Greek civilization. Concubinage died out; the wife was kept at home for raising children and attending strictly to household affairs, while foreign women, taking the part of courtesans, assumed great liberty and received extraordinary attention. Speaking of them, Paul Gide says: "There was, however, a class of women, who, free from all domestic restraint, could mingle with the men, share their labors and their pleasures. They were the courtesans. The ancients presented them to us, as applying themselves with earnestness to the loftiest studies, and equaling men by the strength of their mind as well as to the extent of their knowledge. Their society offered to the Greeks those intellectual pleasures they could not find among wives or sisters. Thus the Athenian courtesans knew how to appropriate that influence which women always exert among a free and intelligent people. The courtesans filled, in Athenian history, the role which the chaste matron took in the annals of Roman history."

When Grecian society reached this stage, and concubinage disappeared, perhaps their marriage deserved the name of monogamy as much as ours does today. Nicholas, speaking of Greece at this period, remarks: "In Athens, the most refined city of Greece, prostitution was as common as in New York, or London, or Paris; but the Athenians were too honest to disgrace and degrade their courtesans, who were the public and honored companions of their statesmen and philosophers. The Athenians did not differ from our civilizees in fact so much as in pretension. They were, in this respect, less hypocritical. The Aspasias, Phrynes, and Laises of Greece have their counterpart in every modern capital; but we have a conventional standard of morals, which though everywhere disregarded, imposes upon us the meanness of a continual hypocrisy of a very depraving character. It was not so in the age of Pericles and Alcibiades.

Quoting Lady Hamilton our author says, page 861: "The Athenians permitted divorce upon very slight occasions, but it was not permitted without a bill specifying the reason of their separation, which the magistrate must see and approve. . . . It was not unusual to dissolve the marriage tie by mutual consent; in which case the parties were at liberty to dispose of themselves as they thought proper. Nor was it unusual in some parts of Greece to borrow each other's wives."

From these extracts it would appear that the chief difference between the marriage and divorce laws and customs of the ancient Greeks and those of the so-called Christian nations of today, is the fact that divorce with the Greeks was far more easily obtained than with us, and that Grecian men were more honest and humane than we towards the class of women called courtesans or prostitutes. That is to say, there was more of freedom, more of honesty and justice in their sex relations than in ours.

Do not these facts go far to account for the other well known fact that in many ways the Greeks surpassed all other nations, ancient and modern? Was it not because there was more of natural selection in the relation, the function, that produces new human beings, and less of churchstate meddling, less of Grundy interference with the private and personal affairs of each individual, with them than with us?

Rise and Persistence of Hierarchies.

One of the most interesting—as a study of sociology—of all the phases of human life and history, is the formation, the growth and the persistence of hierarchies—priestly orders—those who claim superior knowledge of what are called "sacred things," and who by virtue of such assumed knowledge demand and receive the homage and obedience of their fellow human beings.

To many students of the ever present problems of human life it has ever been a subject of surprise and wonder that the Roman Catholic priesthood, with his "Holiness," the pope (papa), as supreme hierarch at Rome, could or should be able, from age to age, to exert almost unlimited power over the conduct, the lives and the inmost thoughts of many millions of people, a large portion of whom belong to the cultured, the intelligent, the progressive classes or elements of human society.

The same remarks apply to the Mohammedan priesthood, the Jewish, the Hindoo, the Chinese, the Mormon priesthood, not to mention the so-called "Evangelical" Christian priesthoods, and many others of ancient and modern times—how or why is it, asks the unprejudiced student of history, that the vast majority of the human race must be thus victimized, dominated, ruled and robbed of their earnings by a class of men whose chief object—judged by their acts and manner of life, would seem to be an easy and safe way to live at the expense of other people, and at the same time get the honor, the name and fame, of being better, more unselfish, than the rest of mankind?

In common with other inquirers these questions have long been matters of serious study with the writer of these lines. Looking at them now from what seems the philosophic point of view there is really no cause of surprise or wonder. It is simply one more instance, example, of the well known economic principle, demand and supply. In associative human life there is an ever present demand for leaders, for captains, for rulers. The great masses of mankind are consciously weak, consciously timid, fearful, cowardly. Add to this that they are consciously ignorant; ignorant of the powers, forces facts or factors that make up the problems of human existence, and the wonder ceases that there is a perennial demand for teachers, for leaders, for those who know, and who more than we do of the mysteries of "the life that now is and of that which is to come."

From this viewpoint, then, we have no cause for wonder that new hierarchies are constantly springing up and achieving success, in greater or lesser degree. In so-called Christian lands it is the most natural thing in the world that a man or woman, desirous of founding a new sect or hierarchy, claims to build on the alleged teachings of the books known as the Old and New Testaments. In Chicago, within the past few years we have witnessed the rise of at least two new sects or hierarchies that base their claims to credence upon these books.

Of these two, that known as "Zion," is the most noted. The name of its founder is John Alexander Dowie, a native of Scotland, which country has been the birth place, probably, of more hierarchs and hierarchies than any land of equal extent on (or in) the earth.

The other most noted hierarchy having its beginning and chief headquarters in Chicago is known as "Koreshanity," the founder and chief hierarch of which calls himself "Koresh," and whose followers, though not so numerous as those of Dowie, seem to be increasing so rapidly as to attract considerable attention at home and abroad.

Space and time failing for this issue, a part of the matter prepared for this number of Lucifer on the question of "Hierarchs and Hierarchies" must be postponed till next week. M. H.

Brown's Dilemma. A Well Merited Rebuke.

The following "little story" of the way a farmer's wife got ahead of a candidate for congress, last fall, has been handed to us by a visiting friend and helper from Minnesota, who thinks it good enough to deserve a place in Lucifer's columns. It is told by the editor of the "Wabasha (Minn.) Herald" who ran as Democratic candidate for the legislature at the same time that Brown ran for congress. The story was first published in the Rochester (Minn.) "Daily Bulletin," and reads as follows:

"As everybody knows, we did some canvassing with L. L. Brown, the Democratic candidate for Congress, in this district, during the campaign just closed. One night, after the speeches were over, we decided to drive several miles into the country, to see a farmer who was considered a political power in his locality. On reaching his place we found he was away from home, and would not return for several days. We were obliged to remain all night, as it was too late to drive back to town. The farmer's wife desired to show us to bed, in the spare room, but something seemed to bother Brown, and he hesitated. Finally he said: 'If you will give us a couple of quilts we will sleep in the haymow. Your husband is away and it might start some scandal to have a man who is running for Congress to sleep in the house.' The lady protested but Brown was firm and we slept in the haymow. Next morning, just as we were coming out of our sleeping quarters, the farmer's wife was letting the cows out of the yard. She then went to a little shed, near the barn, opened the door and hit a big gentleman cow who was sleeping therein with a club, saying: 'Get up, you good-for-nothing brute, and go with the cows. You're not running for Congress.'"

"Evil to him who evil thinks," and, "as a man thinketh in his heart so is he," are maxims that this candidate for Congress might take home to himself with profit. But perhaps, after all, Mr. Brown was not very far from the truth when speaking of the moral status of the average congressman. When a man adopts politics as a profession, or occupation, it means, usually, a terrible falling off in mental integrity, or sense of manly honor and moral rectitude.

To give her guest a rebuke that would fit other men as well, this hospitable hostess might have said to the bull something like this:

"You, sir, are a gentleman! You have never been known to invade the personality of a cow, uninvited, as man invades that of woman, and therefore you can be trusted to go to the woods with the cows, unattended by a policeman to see that you behave yourself properly towards the weaker but more useful sex." M. H.

"Marriage a Form of Slavery."

So says Prof. Burt Estes Howard of Stanford University, California, in a course of lectures on the "Evolution of the State," as reported in the San Francisco "Examiner." A friend has kindly sent us a clipping from which we quote two closing paragraphs of Prof. Howard's talk on "Patriarchal Society:"

"The domestication of animals was the main factor in accomplishing the change from the savage to the patriarchal state. The savage learned that the animal was useful for other purposes than to eat. Then the new uses of the animal brought the demand for labor, and from this were developed the modern forms of marriage and slavery.

"Marriage arose from the desire of man to secure the labor of the woman, whom he married, and her offspring. It was only a form of slavery. There were two forms—that by capture and that by purchase; and I am sorry to say that in modern society these two forms are most prevalent though they may be hidden under other names."

That a professor in Stanford University should have the courage to speak thus of institutional marriage would seem to show that times have changed since Dr. O. W. Holmes said the green apple does not cling to the bough that supports it with greater tenacity than does the college professor to conservatism.

Would the professors of any eastern college dare to say as much of the most fundamental institution of modern society?

Brother Gardner on Divorce.

"I obsarve dat de semi-annual occashun for pitchin' into de divorce courts is now at hand," said Brother Gardner, as the meeting opened in due and ancient form. "It has allus struck me a mighty inconsistent thing fur people to argue dat you kin trade a hoss which doan' suit—sell a hoss you doan' like—bust up a bizness partnership which ar' unpleasant—give away yer dog an' pizen yer cat, but you mustn't part from the husband or wife who is makin' yer life one of misery. I thank de law dat it was wise enuff to foresee some sartin things, and among 'em de fact dat people would make mistakes in marryin'. It is only natural dat dey should, and when dey do, divorce am de easiest way out. If de law refused divorces, elopements and murders would increase 100 per cent.

"When you hav tied up two people who truly love, honor, an' respect each other—who kin bear and sacrifice—who can smile in adversity as well as in sunshine—you hev done a blessed thing, an' arth an' heaven ar' de better fur it. But when you hev tied up two pussons who argy, bicker, dispute, and hate—who see nuffin alike—who kin neither love nor respect, you would have de heart of Satan to force 'em to continue such a life. You could't do it. Dat would be murder if no other escape offered.

"Me an' my ole woman hev stood by each other for nigh onto fifty y'ars, an' we ar' gwine to sail in de same boat cl'ar down to de bank of de dark ribber. We agree. We ar' fitted fur each other. We think alike. But suppose we didn't? Suppose we quarrelled an' bickered an' wished each other dead? De law which would compel us to live together would be an inhuman thing. I ar' glad ebery time I see dat a divorce has been granted. I wish de cost was only five dollars, and de time reduced to one day. Husbands would hev mo' respect an' tenderness fur deir wives—wives mo' confidence in deir husbands."

VARIOUS VOICES.

F. Siman, Omaha, Neb.:—I congratulate you, Brother Harman, on not being altogether alone in the fight for more light. I have just read a book printed in Germany that almost took my breath away, for surprise and joy. The characters therein are not so mild as those in "Hilda's Home," but more of the style of what I judge Lillian Harman to be—self-reliant and independent. To any of your German readers who would like to know that Lucifer's teachings have taken root in Germany I give name of author and publisher: "Dar dritte Geschlect," by Ernst von Wobzogen, Richard Eckstein, Berlin, IXI 57.

W. Wendt, Newburyport, Mass.:—From what do you start your system of dating? Do you still sell literature on sex-reform? If so, please send lists.

[We date from the burning of Giordano Bruno, the learned and brave martyr in the cause of astronomic science and the right to freedom of opinion on all subjects, whether physical, metaphysical or speculative. The current chronology is unscientific and mythologic. The Christian church defended the flat-earth theory, the geocentric cosmogony, and because Bruno defended the theory that the earth is a planet revolving round the sun he was burned at the stake, Feb. 11, 1600, of the Christian dating. M. H.]

Sidney S. Bailey, N. J.:—I send stamps to pay for "Plain Words on the Woman Question," "New Hedonism" and "Evolution of the Family." I formerly sent a considerable amount in small orders for books to your office, but of late cannot afford it. I am now dependent on the income of a small farm and have to compete in the market with negroes and Italians and can hardly keep the wolf from the door. I am disseminating reform literature in Vineland and vicinity and if no one else has volunteered to do it I will spread your leaflets, "To Mothers," etc. Possibly some good to you as well as others will come of it. I am watching your brave work and wonder at your courage. I liked very much C. L. James' recent article in Lucifer, entitled, "Liberty the Chief Factor in Progress."

THE EDUCATION OF THE FEMININE WILL.

BY MLLE. HARLOR.

"To be able to reason and to have pride is superfluous for one who has only to obey. . . . Reason is the liberator of conscience"—p. 7.

"Not only is it necessary to claim economic emancipation; it is necessary to preach moral emancipation at the same time and with equal fervor. It must be said that the first without the second would be three-quarters barren, and that the decisive revolution is the inward revolution. . . . Resignation the perpetual avowal of impotency."—pp. 9, 11.

A wonderfully clear and strong exposition of the demands of awakened womanhood—by a self-reliant, self-respecting woman.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents.

What The Young Need to Know: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages, 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover: 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home. By Rosa Graul, "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth. $1.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. By E. C. Walker. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"A WOMAN in order to live the purest life, must be FREE, must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially,"—Page 265. THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gliders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., No. 8. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, MARCH 9, E. M. 301. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE No. 855.

Defense of the Pharisee.

[This poem appeared in Lucifer several weeks ago, but was marred by the omission of the closing line. We now reprint it complete.]

Conscious of uprightness, the Pharisee
Stood in the Temple and in manly pride
Said, "I am thankful that, whate'er betide,
I still maintain my soul's integrity."

Some call it Egotism; but to me
It seems no man can e'er be justified
When, knowing his own worth, he sets aside
His honest judgment for Hypocrisy.

The Publican who beats his breast and cries:
"Be merciful to me, a sinner, Lord!"
Either his manhood does not rightly prize,
Or seeks, with cringing and obsequious word,
To ape humility before men's eyes,
The better screen his baseness to afford.

Great Spirits Gone.

BY C. L. JAMES.

During the last weeks of the nineteenth century, a life which had promised brilliantly, closed at Naumberg, Germany, in the gloom of a man's seclusion. Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche, born in 1844, retired, by his friends, as incurable, in 1889, led, therefore, an active life of only forty-five years. His national erudition and his high literary ability, are alike unquestionable. His earliest work was criticism; his point of departure from accepted philosophies was Pessimism. In his first treatise, The Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music, he seeks, as a disciple of Schopenhauer, to show how music, especially the higher kinds, is the idealized language of pain; and how Wagner's doctrine that it can express the forms of thought no less than the substance of emotion, is demonstrated by the metamorphose of the Grecian ode into the tragedy.

Two years later, he stated, very ably, the now rather platitudinous doctrines of the Pessimist—Will, the essence of individual life, is evil; the good (necessarily a funereal fire kindled for a moment on the verge of annihilation) is realized by those who have learned to renounce all personal aims—the saint, who lives to benefit others; the philosopher, who lives only to know; the artist, who lives only to create. In 1878, Nietzsche had reduced these three beatifications to one. "Altruism," he points out—the life for others—requires others willing to accept the sacrifice; and thus virtue can exist only for the suicidal purpose of perpetuating vice. With equal ease, the philosopher's devotion to pure thought is proved pursuit of an absurdity. Love of art remains the only passion which can lift man out of self-will and its self-defeating issues, without precipitating him into a deeper deep.

Nietzsche was always too much of a Pessimist to doubt the necessity that this should be done. But in his later works he proceeds from a new and startling premise—the standing obstacle to creative art, both "useful" and beautiful, is the accepted moral law. In the Pedigree of Ethics ("Genealogie der Moral") he assails this law by the most slaughtering of all possible methods—the historical. One by one the virtues are called up for judgment, and convicted on their record, of being vices. Honesty, of course, is the cowardice of siding with the strongest robbers; chastity the trick of forming a "trust" in sexual service. Gratitude is the stupidity of supposing the past superior to the present; conscientiousness is the indecency of being disgusted with oneself, like a prostitute or some other poor wretch who has settled down to violating the natural instincts habitually for bread.

Such a miserable creature man indeed has become, as the price of what he calls his civilization. Nietzsche was far too modern a thinker not to believe in progress; but he had probably realized its zig-zag form—at any rate his subsequent writings are a sort of dithyrambic ode, perpetually growing wilder and wilder, in praise of a great projected reaction. Man must break the cage into which Philistinism has decoyed him—he must become again "a magnificent blond beast, roaming wantonly about in search of victory and prey."

That such thoughts, however erratic, represents a spirit that pervades our air, appears by their having exercised as much fascination upon many as Rousseau's praise of the noble and innocent savage—who never existed. Nietzsche has left disciples who maintain that his insanity was like that of Solomon de Caus, of Tasso, and so many other geniuses too sane for this delirious world. No doubt, according to one sense, it was. The proverbial affinity between great wits and madness has been reduced to rational theory, and should occasion no further controversy.

But that Nietzsche became insane can be proved easily enough. As early as 1879 he was compelled by insomnia to resign his academic chair. He was haunted to frenzy by such morbid fancies as that of eternal recurrence, which Maryatt had burlesqued in Peter Simple. His effusions, long before death suspended, assumed that frantic style, so characteristic of the brainless bellower, whose principle is reproducing Carlyle's worst faults without any of his merits. And his "disciples"—the Egoists, who have recently afflicted England and America—reach for lower depths of fatuity than his. They confound his "Dionysiac Pessimism" with the "self-interest" which he utterly repudiated. They dress the empty skulls of Helvetius and Locke in laurels stolen from one who would have been first to deride such predecessors as Philistines of the Philistines.

We do not, however, study a genius to pity but to learn from him. Of course it would be idle to study Nietzsche for a solution of the metaphysical problem. Among his sanest persuasions was its utter insolubility. Equally vain would it be to expect a fundamentally new view of Things in General. Almost every point about Nietzsche's practical philosophy—that the Volition to Know is delusion, that the Volition to Persuade is humbug, that Art is the end of wisdom, that the true theory of conduct is not to be learned from moralists but from dramatists—may be found in Oscar Wilde, who does not appear to have ever heard of him. It is the historical identification of art with the pathos of disappointment, and of ethics with the conventionalities of society, which give Nietzsche his chief claims to the character of an original thinker, and connect his work to the majestic sweep of modern thought into the Niagara of Anarchism.

I have long delayed a tribute to the memory of Ingersoll, because the subject invites with dire solicitation towards platitude. But a jackass has recently provoked me, by raising his hoof against the dead lion. The name of the jackass is Henry Thurston Peck. His essay on Ingersoll is a model of commonplace, and almost forces a critic to say something new. Introducing Ingersoll with an account of the Republican convention in 1876, he informs us that Ingersoll's political brilliancy carried the weight of his agnosticism (his craving for political distinction was actually his weak point). Ingersoll, says Peck with magnificent defect of originality, had exactly the talent of a stump speaker. He was no philosopher, no logician, no scholar, only a decently well-informed man with a glib rhetorical tongue. And then—awake, ye powers of Cant!—if Ingersoll's opinion should be true—that is, if death ends all—this was one of those truths which regard for the happiness and virtue of mankind should have taught him to suppress. Or, if loyalty to truth compelled so painful an avowal, it should have been made with the tenderest compassion for disillusioned man, with the carefulest avoiding of anything that could shock or jar sensibilities in any case so deeply to be wounded.

Now either information or loyalty to truth is painfully lacking in a critic on Ingersoll who makes him say or think that death ends all. He declared, in public, on several occasions, with great emphasis and characteristic eloquence, his conviction that death does not end all. The wonderments of Christians and materialists, and their mutterings about inconsistency, called forth from the great iconoclast one of those brief replies which far more than his labored orations demonstrated that he did possess the powers of an original philosopher. Ingersoll acknowledged, of course, that objective proof of immortality was somewhat lacking. But that subjective intuition of immorality natural to man, he was not ashamed of sharing with other men, because he observed it to be associated with the higher parts of our nature—with the altruistic emotions and the self-assertion of intellectual strength.

As to Catholic and Protestant dogmatism, so far from having brought this instinct into the world, they had done all in their power to discredit it, and this they betrayed by their very surprise that one who saw their absurdity should retain it. There is not the slightest doubt that Europe and America contains thousands of educated and half educated people who disbelieve in the immortality of the soul, or rather lean towards unbelief (for the true unbeliever is born not made) just because they have been taught to associate immortality with such fables as bodily resurrection and such atrocities as everlasting fire. To have no mercy for these monstrosities, which appeal only to men's fears, is not to destroy but to emancipate their hope.

And while on the subject of orthodoxy as opposed to religious intuition, I may pause to quote (from memory), a sentence of Ingersoll's than which very few exhibit in higher measure the powers of a logical thinker: "It is the peculiarity of a truth that it fits into everything else. It is the peculiarity of a lie that it will fit into nothing except another lie made on purpose to fit it. It follows the more lies you tell, the more you must tell, until some one necessarily gets sick of lying, and proposes to return to truth at the point where it was abandoned. That is what they call a reformation."

There is a whole philosophy of history in these few words. Scarcely any men have ever been less like each other than Ingersoll and Nietzsche. The magnificent physique; the healthfulness in mind, in heart, in manner; the playfulness; the burliness, approaching clumsiness; the common sense, with its constant peril of relapse into commonplace, which so strikingly characterize the American orator; present a perfect contrast to the overstrung nerve, the morbid introspection, the melancholia, the weakness, the brain oppressed by learning, of the German pedant.

Yet both were creatures of their common age, moving alike towards "one divine far-off event." Ingersoll in his inspired moments saw as clearly, though he saw with far less painful consistency than Nietzsche, that the Volition to Know is self-delusion, that the Volition to Persuade is hypocrisy; that Philistinism is rhetorical knavery working on metaphysical folly; that the creative instinct alone is the divine; that (his love of Burns and Shakespeare proves) its last result is Art, a holier thing than even Science, for physical science only removes obstacles to human happiness, but the creation of beauty is the creation of happiness itself.

That Ingersoll's own power as an artist far outweighs his power as a special pleader is surely proved by the single circumstance that during the last twenty years of life his polemics against Christianity (we all acknowledge) destitute of up to date argument, had yet been translated into every language under heave.. The serious place in literature of anything which attains that sort of success is beyond impugnment by a critic though he were a Gervinus instead of a Peck! It has been passed upon forever by the last literary tribunal. If this estimate of Ingersoll be at all correct, it is evident that his stump-oratorical rhetoric, his party politics, his Truth Seeker arraignment of orthodoxy, are none of them the secret of his prominence and influence. They attract attention only as types of what everybody knows at sight. The power which made them types was in the personal gifts, not always very happily employed—in the creative imagination, the word-painting, the pathos, the humor, the benevolence, the love of freedom, the love of truth, the gigantic reserved force which on occasions like those cited demolished without apparent effort every opponent upon whom it deigned to spend itself from Gladstone down to Talmage.

It was in that deep, broad, genial nature to which such distinctions as between hope for a future life and belief in Lazarus' resuscitation were not a matter of theory but of instinct. Above all it was in the fulness of the modern spirit—the quick eye for the Impossible, the keen scent for the Insincere, the scorn of "the world and worldlings base," the impassioned foresight of a world regenerated by liberty, science, and culture. Ingersoll is strongest exactly where readers of the Peck grade (whether friendly or hostile is immaterial) are least able to appreciate his strength. In such a discourse as the Mistakes of Moses, even one who laughs at the wit, may know that the data were far better handled by Austrue and his successors. We are spared such reflections in a discourse like Crimes Against Criminals.

Yet Ingersoll was not in the least to blame for wasting time on Moses. That the church is "the mother of humbugs," the preserver of them all, the inspirer of the Movement in Favor of Ignorance, whose influence every one desirous to promote knowledge must find some means of overcoming, was as sound an intuition as Ingersoll needed have. While orthodox Pecks do not see, or affect not to see, that Ingersoll did anything for moral and social reform, there are "radical" Sniffs who blame him for not doing enough. But "wisdom is justified of her children." Strong as Ingersoll's head was, his heart was better. Indeed there is a point of view from which it may be pronounced too good. As a legend tells about Jesus, he could find something to speak kindly of in everything; and his eulogies on Jim Blaine, Henry Ward Beecher, &c., were not purchased puffs, but over flowings of this amiable temper, which, however, when he reached Depew, became too sloppy even for the American public—who can stand much in that line.

Accordingly, Ingersoll's life is well known to have surpassed his writings in merit. Platitudinous Peck finds convenient to assume its excellence was of that "good husband, good father" type which is proper in an obituary. But this again speaks ill either for P. P.'s information or his honesty. One who writes about a person so much in the public eye as Ingersoll, ought to know that his was one of those shining lives which become beacons to posterity. His household; conducted on Anarchistic principles; in which children were never punished, never scolded, never forbidden, never commanded; in which there were no "time," no rules, no authority; and where every one did exactly as he pleased, had been practically open for years; and the innumerable guests were unanimous in reporting it as Paradise.

Such an object lesson far outweighed the effect of the regrettable circumstance that, in words, Ingersoll did not appreciate Anarchism or free love. His later utterances as compared with his earlier—his reply to the Gladstonian view of marriage for example—show plainly enough in what direction his theory was following his practice. Peck says he did nothing to ennoble humanity. But I think Peck is here (as frequently) mistaken.

(TO BE CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

From "The Heart of Life."

One of the characters says this to his mistress, who is another man's wife:

"He talks about chastity. He has no idea of what the word means. The canon's idea of virtue are those of a converted pig. . . . . Some one else has taught me to feel in my heart of hearts the holy and living thing that this virtue really is—to feel that, in its highest form, it is no refusal or negation, but the self-devotion of body and soul at once—of the reasonable soul and flesh that is one man. Chastity is the complete living of one human being for another, which is merely the humanised form of the Saints living for God. . . . . You have been a presence always dwelling in me, softening all my hard thoughts and quickening all my good ones, and giving my soul wings, and enabling me to bear sorrow."

Again, the principal character talking with another lady, this coversation takes place:

"Who are the women whose faces shine at us from the pages of the Gospel? Of course there is the Sacred Mother, and Mary the sister of Lazarus. But who are the others? They are Mary Magdalen, the woman of Samaria, and the woman taken in adultery."

"I think," said Miss de Souza, "that sin in women like these, is only the flame of devotion blown sideways, or even downwards."

"Whilst your Pharisees," added he, "are people whose chimney never smokes, for the simple reason that they never have any fire in it."—W. H. Mallock, in "Morning."

Womanhood, Virginity, Motherhood.

It has struck me that we want some name for the Divine Woman. A Divine Man lived, and died. Where is the Divine Woman?

I see her as I walk along Bundle-street; along King William-street I see her! In half a mile, generally two or three. Occasionally I see her in portraits in the "Illustrated London News" or "Graphic." I often see her on the tramcar.

She may be of any class, educated or uneducated. But Nature (which is God, viewed objectively) has marked in her face the Ideal of Womanhood. There is a look on her of soft eternal Motherhood, which attracts us, which envelopes us!

If our minds are preoccupied, if we are worried, if our aims are low, if we have a friend with us engaging in useless conversation—O God! if we are anything less than MEN, these things are not for us.

Blessed be Manhood! Blessed be Womanhood! Flow, blessed tears, while I cry to the wide earth, I cry to my neighbors—and none shall be left out—I love you, my dears!

Archbishop O'Reilley, who is a Man, would say, "We have the idea of Divine Womanhood in the Virgin Mary!" I do not deny it, and the point is not to be missed. The Motherhood is pure, pure as Virginity. But who, at this hour, can bend his neck to the yoke to help pull along a whole van-full of disused furniture—a whole cart-load of Dogmas and Devils!

I have no faith in devils; I don't believe in Satan even! He had been handed down to us from our aboriginal ancestors. But I believe in saints. We are all "called to be sancti" in the best sense of the word.—Omrah in "Morning."

REMARKS ON THE ABOVE.

To my thinking the purity of Motherhood is higher, nobler, greater, than the purity of Virginity. Virginity is an interesting phase of human life mainly because it means possible motherhood—motherhood in embryo, in anticipation, so to speak. When the time has passed in which motherhood is possible then virginity ceases to be interesting, and we naturally inquire,

"Why has the Possible not become the Actual?

"Why has not the purity of maidenhood been crowned with the purity of motherhood?"

"Why has not the blossom stage developed into fruitage?"

Is not old-maidenhood a case of arrested development?

The flower is beautiful to the eye and fragrant to the olfactories—two of the senses, but the ripened fruit gratifies three of the senses—sight, smelling and taste, and more important still, it furnishes the SEED through which comes a new plant with its possibilities of flowers and fruit, and also its power to nourish and perpetuate animal life as well.

Yes, virginity, maidenhood, is beautiful, pure and good, but like the beauty, the purity and goodness of the flower, these qualities in the maiden are interesting mainly because of the promise of their full fruition in the phase of life called Motherhood.

Who Holds the Keys?

From the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table."

Every person's feelings have a front-door and a side-door by which they may be entered. The front-door is on the street. Some keep it always open; some keep it latched; some, locked; some, bolted,—with a chain that will let you peep in, but not get in; and some nail it up, so that nothing can pass its threshold. This front-door leads into a passage which opens into an ante-room, and this into the interior apartments. The side-door opens at once into the sacred chambers.

There is almost always at least one key to this side door. This is carried for years hidden in a mother's bosom. Fathers, brothers, sisters, and friends, often, but by no means so universally, have duplicates of it. The wedding ring conveys a right to one; alas, if none is given with it!

If nature or accident has put one of these keys into the hands of a person who has the torturing instinct, I can only solemnly pronounce the words that Justice utters over its doomed victim,—The Lord have mercy on your soul! You will probably go mad within a reasonable time,—or, if you are a man, run off and die with your head on a curb-stone, in Melbourne or San Francisco,—or, if you are a woman, quarrel and break your heart, or turn into a pale, jointed petrification that moves about as if it were alive, or play some real life-tragedy or other.

Be very careful to whom you trust one of these keys of the side-door. The fact of possessing one renders those even who are dear to you very terrible at times. You can keep the world out from your front-door, or receive visitors only when you are ready for them; but those of your own flesh and blood, or of certain grades of intimacy, can come in at the side-door, if they will, at any hour and in any mood. Some of them have a scale of your whole nervous system, and can play all the gamut of your sensibilities in semitones,—touching the naked nerve pulps as a pianist strikes the keys of his instrument. I am satisfied that there are as great masters of this nerve-playing as Vieuxtemps or Thalberg in their lines of performance.

Married life is the school in which the most accomplished artists in this department are found. A delicate woman is the best instrument; she has such a magnificent compass of sensibilities! From the deep inward moan which follows pressure on the great nerves of right, to the sharp cry as the filaments of taste are struck with a crashing sweep, is a range which no other instrument possesses. A few exercises on it daily at home fit a man wonderfully for his habitual labors, and refresh him immensely as he returns from them. No stranger can get a great many notes of torture out of a human soul; it takes one that knows it well,—parent, child, brother, sister, intimate.

Be very careful to whom you give a side-door key; too many have them already.

Imperialism.

The drift, the trend, of the Washington government, away from the simplicity and economy of the Jeffersonian administration of public affairs, one hundred years ago, and towards the pomp, the splendor and the extravagance of the monarchies of Europe and Asia, was never so manifest as at the second inaugural of our elective monarch, William McKinley—reminding us of the closing lines of the poem, "Parrhasius":

> We look upon our splendor and forget
> The thirst of which we perish.

Grant Allen and His Critics.

Among those who have had something to say anent the essay of Grant Allen published in our December Library, is a correspondent and subscriber who writes us after this manner:

It appears to me that Grant Allen did not know what he was about in his "Plain Words on the Woman Question," which you printed in Light-Bearer Library for December. If it were not for the timely remarks by E. C. Walker there are sufficient reasons for confusion.

According to the theory the chief purpose of existence is the perpetuation of the race. He refers to August Comte as to how this should be done, "all men to support all women." This is, as E. C. Walker mentions, done today.

August Comte with his positivism has rendered a service to humanity by calling attention to the fact that "Whoever desires to comprehend sociology is bound to have a rudimentary knowledge of preceding positive sciences; such as mathematics, astronomy, physics, chemistry, and biology."

But as concerning the station he assigns to women J. S. Mill finds the best answer. August Comte makes angels and goddesses of them, but denies them justice.

What a horrible condition it would be to debar every woman from the useful activities and merely suffer her to live as a means for the perpetuation of the race. I am not able to comprehend the motive of modern writers like Allen who concern themselves so much about the existence, or extinction of the race. Take, for instance, Tolstoy. He will tell you, "The best existence is non existence."

Concerning the emancipation of women there is only one way open, according to my observation, in nature. This will be to induce men to esteem and honor women for spiritual qualities, and not for their physical charms alone.

To attain this condition woman must rise and enlarge her mind; must scatter dogma, grandy, and tradition to the winds By this means she will compel the lords of creation to see that there is a double life in each of us—the physical and the spiritual; or the high or low.

The head and front of Grant Allen's offending, in his essay, "Plain Words About Women," appears to be this:

In order that the human race should continue to exist, in its present visible and tangible form, upon the planet earth, Grant Allen assumes,

First, There must be children.

Second, In order that there be children there must be mothers—whether there be fathers or not.

Third, Women, and women only, can be mothers of children, since, by nature's economic rulings, men are incapable of becoming mothers, and no labor-saving machine, incubator or what-not, has yet been invented to take the place of woman as mother, in the work of human reproduction, and no "elixir of life" has yet been found to enable human beings to live on, indefinitely, in the present visible and tangible form.

These three axiomatic truths having been assumed as needing only clear statement to secure universal assent, Grant Allen proceeds to show, by cold, hard, unrelenting facts and figures, that each normally developed woman must bear, on the average—four children, the alternative being race-extinction, racial suicide.

The object of the entire essay, as I understand it, is not to enslave woman by compulsory motherhood but rather to secure her against compulsory motherhood, such as is now her fate, by rational education, in regard to her rights and duties as race builder, and by an economic re-adjustment that would recognize woman's worth in the great industrial human hive.

To do Allen justice, let him speak for himself. On page fourteen of the pamphlet in question occur these words:

> Seeing, then, that these necessities are laid by the very nature of our organization upon women, it would appear as though two duties were clearly imposed upon the women themselves, and upon all those men who sympathize in their welfare: First, to see that their training and education should fit them above every thing else for this their main function in life; and, second, that in consideration of the special burdens they have to bear in connection with reproduction, all the rest of life should be made as light and easy and free for them as possible.

If there be injustice or hardship for woman in this pivotal statement it is not the fault of the author but of Mother Nature herself, in putting the heavier burden on the weaker shoulders. Grant Allen would not deny to woman the right to engage in the "useful activities," but would place her in a position where she could freely choose between motherhood, with its responsibilities and perils, on the one hand, and the bread-winning occupations, works of art, etc., on the other.

To make the "perpetuation of the race the chief purpose of existence" is simply to follow nature herself, whose chief effort manifestly is to "keep the ball of life rolling,"—to keep the race from dying out,—with less regard for the fate of the units.

If Tolstoy, or any other man, teaches that the "best existence is non-existence," all I have to say is that to me such utterances indicate mental abnormality if not downright insanity. Nothing interests me except that which ministers to life!—that exalts, magnifies and glorifies life. I have no interest in death or non-existence except a feeling of aversion, abhorrence, antagonism.

With the last two paragraphs of our critic, Grant Allen's writings are in perfect accord, as I understand them. No one who has read "The Woman Who Did," for instance, could accuse this world-famous author of desiring to make woman a slave to race-production, or to conventional standards of sex morality. Yes, "woman must rise and enlarge her field of vision." She must be her own emancipator her own savior.

When woman saves herself from the curse of man's domination in the sex relation the race will be saved from the curse of man-rule-over-man, of robbery and murder of the weak and ignorant by the cunning and strong, and not before. M. H.

Reaction Against Materialism

In last Lucifer something was said of the "Rise and Persistence of Hierarchies"—priestly orders, ecclesiastic organizations, etc. In this article it is proposed to consider briefly some of the causes that underlie and produce the phenomenal growth of modern hierarchies, cults, isms, such as Eddyism,—"Christian Science;" Dowieism—"Zion," Teedism, "Koreshanity;" Wilmansism—"Mental Science;" Weltmerism, Hypnotism, Telepathy—including, perhaps, the still more widely spread cult or ism known as Modern Spiritualism.

As some of us see it, the rapidity, the ease, with which all these isms have obtained credence and adherents is owing in great measure to a natural and normal reaction against the abnormally materialistic teachings of orthodox Christianity, orthodox medical science and orthodox, or accepted, physical science.

According to theologic teaching the physical body is the real personality—the soul, mind or spirit being constantly spoken of as an appendage, an annex or possession, of the body. The constant exhortation of the church was, and is, "Save your soul!" Not save YOURSELF, but save your soul, by washing it in the blood of the slain Jesus, and by eating his flesh and drinking his blood. The church teaches a material resurrection of the body, a material heaven and material hell, and was, and is, extremely solicitous concerning its own material holdings in this world; demanding exemption from taxes, etc.

Not less materialistic were the teachings of medical doctors. Disease, with them, was a material entity to be driven out by material poisons—drugs. Mind, soul, spirit, was simply the result of material organization; the brain producing mind much as the liver secretes bile, and that hence the death of the body means the ending of the individualized personality.

Much in the same way argued many if not most of the teachers of physical science, the chemists, the geologists, astronomers, etc. The visible, the tangible universe is all that there is; or at least that there is nothing except that which can be reduced to a condition cognizable by one or more of the five bodily senses.

Against all these materialistic philosophies, cults or isms there came a natural reaction, a normal or healthy reaction, as some of us think, but with this normal reaction came also the tendency to swing to the opposite extreme; the tendency to ignore, to slight and to deny the very existence of things material.

And thus it is we find the rationale of the existence of a swarm of new cults, sects, isms, each with its leader or leaders ambitious of distinction if not also covetous of wealth and power over their fellow human beings. Not that all these leaders are impelled by sordid, or narrowly selfish motives only. That many if not all of them are really trying to help the oppressed and unfortunate to better conditions of life I verily believe. But in an age when money means power and influence it is difficult if not impossible to withstand the temptation to use money and power for personal aggrandizement as well as for altruistic helpfulness, or for the enlightenment and uplifting of the ignorant, the oppressed and enslaved, and hence we very naturally find Mrs. Eddy riding in her private palace car and Brother Dowie the proud possessor of millions as the result of tithes given to the "Overseer of Zion."

Again I find it impossible to close this investigation and make the applications intended, without occupying too much of our space, and will therefore probably take it up again next week. M. H.

Co-operative Homes.

"The Ascent of Life is the Ascent of Ideals," says the author of the book called the "Ascent of Life." A truer saying scarce ever was uttered.

First must come unrest—discontent with the old, and with this unrest must come desire for something better. Then the ideal, the mental concept, of the newer and better.

The ideal home of most people now living in lands called civilized, is, and has for many ages been, a house and surroundings fitted up for the dwelling place of one family, consisting of father, mother and children, and perhaps servants or hired help. The parlor; the living room; the dining room; the kitchen; the pantry; the store room; the library; the bedrooms; the closets, halls, bath-room, verandas, garden, lawns, orchard, barn, etc., etc., all were planned, built and laid out for the comfort, convenience and happiness of one monogamic family—the unit and type of the state or nation.

There was, and is, much to be commended in this ancient, but narrow and exclusive ideal, but now, in the course of human evolution, a newer ideal, and, as some of us think, a higher and better, is slowly but surely forming. A number of books have been written outlining plans for the co-operative home—the home that will combine the advantages of the old exclusive ideal with the newer, the broader, the more inclusive ideal; the ideal more in accord with fraternalism, equality, liberty, solidarity and universal commonwealth, in human affairs, and not so much in accord with paternalism, patriarchalism, monarchy, nationalism and monopoly.

Many attempts have been made to practicalize the co-operative ideal in the home, but few if any of these attempts have been crowned with the success their projectors hoped for them—mainly, as I think, because too much was attempted at first. Our new idealists are prone to forget that the instincts, the tendencies, the prejudices that have been the growth of ages cannot be overcome, or even radically changed, in the space of one or two generations.

Among the pointers showing that a change is coming in the home ideal, the following description of what has been done as a business venture in Omaha, is interesting. The article was written by one of Lucifer's friends and helpers, Walter Breen, and published in the "Nebraska Socialist." It reads thus:

> Love of home has always been held dear by the Anglo-Saxon race, and yet in this era of transition we note a few ripples of the coming change. A few years ago a firm of real estate dealers in this city erected a modern apartment house, suitable for a limited number of families.

The house was architecturally well finished, and had a pleasant appearance from the street. The lawn and flower beds were looked after in the summer, and steam heat from one boiler room thoroughly heated each room and hall in the winter. The building was scarcely finished before all the apartments were taken, and since then vacant apartments have not stood empty very long ere they were filled by new occupants.

Since the above described apartment house was built, two more of a similar pattern have been erected, improved in size and in other ways—a well-floored dancing room being added for the general use of the tenants. The rent for the average suite of rooms in these places are not what at first sight would be termed low, the average being about $35 to $40 per month. If these were low one could understand people in comfortable circumstances discarding houses costing from $25 to $30 per month and taking apartments.

There must be some other reason, then, for the once much coveted individual home being discarded (by some people) for the communal home. A critical examination discloses many reasons, social and economic, for this tendency to radically change our style of living. Briefly stated, they are as follows: economy, comfort and sociability.

The economy of living in an apartment house comes in (comparison of course being made with the individual home renting for $25 per month) in many ways. A suite of rooms can be heated by steam cheaper than a private house can be heated by stove or furnace. There is a saving in water bills, etc.—one nice lawn, well kept, costs no more around an apartment house than around a private house.

For comfort, there is a decided saving in labor in an apartment house, which furnishes heat and janitor service, over the individual home where stoves or furnaces must be taken care of, and rooms swept and tidied by some member or members of the household (should help not be employed). Few individual homes can have a specially built dance hall, and lastly, few houses renting for $25 or $30 are as well built and equipped as the above described suites.

For sociability, there are many arguments that might be made, showing why people are adopting the new style of living. Every man and woman knows the pleasure of social converse with pleasant neighbors and friends. How often on a winter evening we feel at a loss to know how to pass the time, and are repelled from making a trip out doors on account of bad weather, to make a call and have a social chat over a game of cards, whereas, if it was simply a matter of going up or down a flight of stairs, we would not hesitate for a moment.

Then again there are times of sudden illness that make everyone appreciate a near and kind neighbor. This change in our mode of living is now affecting only a few families. Later on, as is attested by the growth in eastern cities, there will be more people affected by it. So in this we can see the steady movement toward socialism. Now of course rented suites of rooms in apartment houses do not constitute socialism, but in the change from the individual home to the collective home is a decided movement in that direction.

Among the books referred to as outlining the co-operative ideal in home life, may be named "Papa's Own Girl," by Marie Howland; "Cityless and Countryless World," by Henry Olerich, and "Hilda's Home," by Rosa Graul.

M. H.

You doubt whether liberty can be trusted. I am very sure that tyranny cannot be trusted, and I am furthermore sure that the care of liberty cannot be delegated to any representatives. Liberty cannot be put under bonds to keep the peace without liberty being lost and peace unattained. All the so-called evils of liberty have been the evils of the lack of liberty. We shall have to accept the real logic of liberty at last, for there is nothing under the sun that can be trusted in its place.—Geo. D. Herron.

VARIOUS VOICES.

W. G. Markland, Highland Park, Tenn.:—I send you $2 to apply on subscription to Lucifer, for Leon H. Markland. I am now yard superintendent at a stave and heading factory and have applicants for work at eighty cents per ten hours work, from men who own homes and others minus homes. Average four or five per day. This shows the condition of the labor market. The "shut downs" and failures of this region outnumber largely the new enterprises. It seems to me that a boom of advanced thought on all lines is coming fast. The trend toward concentration of private wealth and that toward poverty must naturally produce effervescence. I feel more hopeful than ever before.

J. Harman, Jeannette, Texas:—I often think of you, and read Lucifer through, every one of them. I lend it to a few select persons, but cannot think of any one in this country who would pay for it and read it. It is very strange to me that every one cannot see that the way to improve the race is by selection. We all know how to improve horses, cattle and hogs, but seem not to know that the same wise selection will improve the human race. I cannot help admiring you and Lillian for your unyielding perseverance and wish I could do something to help on the great work in which you are engaged, but it seems I can do very little. I send one dollar for Light-Bearer Library and one to pay arrears on Lucifer.

Helping Sadie A. and W. P. Magoon.

In response to the call of a friend, for help for a very worthy pair of victims of misfortune, Sadie A. and W. P. Magoon, of Los Angeles, Calif., we have received the following sums:

Frederica de Crane, and others at Orange City, Iowa.	2,00
William and Elizabeth Towne, Holyoke, Mass.	5,00
A Friend, New Haven, Conn.	25
Mrs. Ria B. Brnce, Big Rapids, Mich.	1,00
C. M. Moe, Spokane, Wash.	1,00
T. M. Connell, Brooklyn, N. Y.	2,00

In the name of our sick and needy co-workers we sincerely thank these generous donors.

Combination Offers.

Light-Bearer Library—Monthly magazine, forty-eight pages each, price of twelve numbers (nine of which are now ready) fifty cents—and Lucifer one year of fifty-two numbers, price one dollar, will both be sent to new subscribers for one dollar and twenty-five cents. Single copies of the magazine will be sent for five cents; sample copies of Lucifer free.

Life History of Moses Harman (in preparation)—four hundred pages, bound in cloth with portrait, price one dollar (sample pages of which book will be sent on application), and Lucifer, one year of fifty-two numbers, price one dollar, will both be sent to all new subscribers for one dollar and fifty cents

LUCIFER FIFTY CENTS PER YEAR.

To meet the universal demand for cheapness in literature we now offer Lucifer one year, of fifty-two numbers, for fifty cents to new subscribers in clubs of five or more; or five years ahead to one subscriber, whether old or new, for two dollars and fifty cents. Will not our "Committee of Ways and Means,"—which committee includes all our helpful co-operators everywhere, make a note of this and act accordingly? We send out many hundreds of samples free, every week, and from this lavish sowing of seed-thoughts we reap a small harvest of subscribers. Will not our friends whose work and that of Lucifer are one and the same, put forth a little effort to secure yearly subscribers, as well as trial subscribers, to these winged seed-sowers?

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all people agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

'The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function" Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents.

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers; 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul, "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form By E. C. Walker. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"A WOMAN in order to live the purest life, must be FREE, must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially."—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD," by Henry Olerich. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 400 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy Price $1. For sale at this office.

Freethought Ideal, Edited by Etta Semple, is published fort-nightly at Ottawa, Kansas. It is the only atheistic paper in the world edited and published by a woman. Fifty cents per year. Samples free.

DO YOU EVER THINK

Of the fate of the Prodigal Daughter? The Prodigal Son is forgiven and received with rejoicing—why should different treatment be accorded to his sister? For a vivid, true picture of the conditions in homes and factories which produce thousands of so-called fallen women every year, read "The Prodigal Daughter; or, The Price of Virtue," by Rachel Campbell. Price, 25 cents.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Lucifer, the Light-Bearer, will be sent free for thirteen weeks with each order for "The Prodigal Daughter." Address M. HARMAN, 500 Fulton Street, Chicago, Ill.

Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness who addresses humanity.—From the Preface.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gliders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

By Grant Allen. "The Old Asceticism said: 'Be Virtuous and You Will Be Happy.' The New Hedonism says: 'Be Happy and You Will Be Virtuous." This is the key note of Grant Allen's Masterpiece. 30 large pages, five cents For sale at this office.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo. 172 pages. Price 25 cents.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint: A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution, its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. Man Self-Creative.

Man is his own star, and the soul that can Render an honest and a perfect man
Commands all life, all influence, all fate;
Nothing to him falls early or too late:
Our acts our angels are; or good or ill,
Our fatal shadows that walk by us still.

From My Point of View.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

The Holy Synod of the Russian Catholic church has at last awakened to the fact that Leo Tolstoi has, by speech and writing, "unceasingly striven to separate himself from all communion with the church." Therefore it has issued a circular of excommunication, signed by three metropolitan arch-bishops and three bishops. It is evident that the church wished to ignore Tolstoi's scathing criticisms as long as possible and thereby confessed its own weakness. An excommunication is no longer the serious thing it was a few years ago. If it were, Tolstoi's present illness would be attributed to the action of the church, instead of natural physiological causes.

The newspaper dispatches report that male friends of the Filipino patriots, General Rio del Pilar and others who were exiled to Guam, dared not be present at the deportation. They feared to expose themselves to the same fate by expressing their sympathies. "Wives, children, and sweethearts," however, "followed the ambulances to the wharf, shrieking and tearing their hair in a frenzy of grief. Gray-headed women, mothers of some of the prisoners, ran barefoot in the dust of the road, tears streaming down their cheeks."

Thus does our imperial government "benevolently assimilate" the husbands and sons of Filipino women, and tear them from home and loved ones and send them to a living death on our Devil's Island of Guam. And we are the people who were so indignant with France for her treatment of Dreyfus.

The civilized nations are kept quite busy, these days, giving lessons in civilization to the heathen Chinese. Strange to say, however, the Chinese women do not always appreciate the treatment which they receive from the brave and generous soldiers representing Christendom. George Lynch, an English war correspondent, writing of the attempts of the Chinese girls to escape the "benevolent assimilation" of these soldiers, writes: "Unused to, and incapable of walking, it was intensely pitiful to see these wretched people, with their tiny, compressed feet trying to get away. In the majority of cases those who did not succeed were assaulted. It is impossible to give details of what came under every one's observation."

The soldiers were sent to China to avenge the missionaries. It was the business of the missionaries to teach Christianity, a cardinal tenet of which religion is that suicide is worse than murder. These girls had not profited by the teachings of the missionaries, for the correspondent continues: "Girls were seen in the river Pei-Ho, near Tung-Chow, who walked into the water where it was not deep enough to cover them, and deliberately held their heads under the surface till they were drowned. . . . . As we traveled along day by day, the sluggish waters of that muddy river carried down a burden of corpses that floated past the junks, among which were to be found a very large proportion of women and girls."

After the heathens are subdued and forced to accept the teachings of the missionaries, the latter may preach sermons on the wickedness of self-destruction, and picture the torments in hell of those self-slain girls. The Christian soldiers will, of course, snugly repose in Abraham's bosom.

The supercilious manner in which some women handle the "servant question" in the public prints is often temper-trying. One of the latest exhibitions is by a writer in "Brann's Iconoclast." "Each in his, or her, station; nature seldom makes the mistake of placing Elizabeth in the kitchen and Nora in the parlor, and when she is guilty of such an error, the results are always disastrous. Our cook would be no more at a loss how to entertain our guests in the drawing-room than we should be how to prepare and serve the dinner which is to refresh and form a very necessary part of the entertainment of these same guests."

There's snobbery for you! Why shouldn't the cook be able to entertain the guests, if necessary? When Helene Dubois went to school, did she not learn that

"Politeness is to do and say
The kindest thing in the kindest way"—

A copy book maxim that is, alas, too little remembered or heeded by either "servants" or "mistresses." But many "servants" are more mindful of it than their mistresses, and to just that degree more fitted to entertain guests. And why shouldn't "we" be able to cook and serve a dinner? To cook and serve palatable, healthful food to our loved ones and guests is certainly as important, to say the least, as any parlor entertainment. And it can, and should be a labor of love.

Great Spirits Gone.

BY C. L. JAMES.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

From the overripeness of a flower about to shed the seed, from the struggles of an abortive bud, to the atmosphere of a night-blooming cactus miraculously opening upon its hour of fairy life, is the transition from Ingersoll and Nietzsche to Oscar Wilde. That he can assume with playful irony all they were laboring to realize, is reason enough for loving Wilde, aside from his supreme merit of being a beautiful sinner who exhibits all the healing terror and pity of immorality to an age fairly rotten with the pellagra of ugly, unattractive sanctimoniousness.

Folly may attempt to plagiarize the others; but Oscar Wildeism is contagious, and warns wisdom not to say much about him for fear of becoming like him—which he characteristically pronounced "the sincerest form of insult."

As a poet, he may not be destined to stand high. His earlier verses are distorted with "storm and stress"—Irish patriotism and Grecian love. The "Ballad of Reading Gaol" is a monument to the soul which refused a fortune from the vulgarity of airing personal suffering in print; but Oscar Wilde would have expected us to know without proof that he was not a snob.

It is in his critical writings that he attains the passionless perfectness of art. Throughout his great little prose book "Intentions," run the following ideas, not in dreary sequence of argument but like the parts of a musical composition which ring melodious changes on a single artistic theme.

Mind is all. This favorite paradox of transcendentalism becomes capable of application as soon as we realize that the nature of mind is to create. It is a mistake to suppose that Turner copied fogs. He made them. There may have been fogs before Turner—there may; but we are justified in complete agnosticism upon that point; for fogs, as known to us, are simply Turners.

And so with everything else. History teaches that Athenian ladies dyed their hair, painted their faces, and wore high-heeled shoes. The Greece of art and letters, of Aphrodite and Zeus, is a Greece which never existed except in the minds of Greek poets and other Grecian artists.

Nothing exists for us but what the artist has taught us to see; and if we compare the vision of the great artist with that view of the same subjects which Philistines have learned from earlier or inferior artists (vulgarly called the facts) we shall find no resemblance.

Thus Beauty, the artist's product; Happiness, the result of beauty, are, or may for any man, be all. Ugliness and misery are nothing but bad art, striving to perpetuate some antiquated ideal such as lust, or lucre, or length of days. In this abyss no man need plunge himself; for the angel of originality prompts everyone to be creating something new; and the demon of imitation has no parent but negative self-distrust.

If the objection be raised that ambitious cranks do not create anything beautiful, the answer is ready—they are typical plagiarists. Of course no one will improve verse, for example, unless he knows what has been done already, and possesses that form of creative genius. But while he is learning, he need not aspire to improve; and when he has learned, he can always create something new.

For the supreme creative art, which in truth sums up all the rest, is Criticism. The inventor is a critic on "the facts;" the sculptor, painter, architect, on the mere maker for "use," the poet upon them; the actor on the poet; the essayist on all the others. Each selects for prominence what delights the soul out of that work of his predecessors which always contained much inferior result.

It follows that the supreme work of criticism is within the individual mind. Thinking is the highest art; and the thinker will be in no hurry to speak, though sometimes he must; because he knows his best thoughts will after all be unintelligible to those addressed. The essential negation—ugliness, unprogressiveness—has, of course, its Bible. Its Law and Gospel are realism in "art" and respectability in life, which is (of course) a branch of art. The thinker, when he condescends to express himself (imperfectly, of course) in either fiction or "real life" is sure to be an innovator, and as such an object of persecution.

Oscar Wilde is dead. There are forebodings of his fate and mission in such sentences from his works as these:

"Society, which is the beginning and basis of morals, exists simply for the concentration of human energy. . . . Society often forgives the criminal; it never forgives the dreamer. . . . They mean well, no doubt, these honest beaming folk. Perhaps that is the reason why they are so excessively tedious. But some one should teach them that while, in the opinion of society, contemplation is the greatest sin of which any citizen can be guilty, in the opinion of the highest culture it is the proper occupation of man."

There it is in a nutshell. Society has no mind but what previous creative art has given it; and if we go beyond that we find (of course through creative hypotheses alone) only the action of force, resembling that we feel in ourselves but blind. Mind ever originating, must ever suffer martyrdom to redeem mind destitute of originality; which, together, make up all. And the latter, being blind, is always going just the opposite way to what it supposes—therefore always most mischievous when it most proposes to be useful.

If any positive philosopher resents the extreme idealism of such views, he should remember that Wilde, unlike Nietzsche and Ingersoll, utterly disclaimed any such absurd "concentration of energy" as is implied in the Philistine term consistency. Therein is his superiority. He aimed to convince nobody. He aimed to make people think.

Practical Co-operation.

Elsewhere in this issue will be found the outlines of a plan to practicalize the principles of co operation, here in Chicago. The following is a copy of blank to be filled out and signed by the members:

The undersigned will pay to the Ideal Society the sum of. . . . . in. . . . . and receive from the Ideal Society an order for services, articles or commodities for the same amount subscribed and paid to said society, less. . . . . per cent for commission, less. . . . . per cent for publication of. . . .

Constitution of the Ideal Society.

Preamble: Co-operation is the basis of civilization. Man, in his primitive state, provided individually for his few necessities, but the complexities of modern civilized life demand that men produce and enjoy in common,—co-operate.

The evolution from individualism to co-operation is going on blindly, and without forethought or method on the part of the people, and the only practical attempt at regulating our economic relations has been made by the trusts, through their ever-increasing power in the control of the vital sources of life. This power of monopoly, if not abrogated by the intelligent action of the people, will soon include the world in a net-work of slavery.

While the majority of the people view this approaching calamity without hope of escape from its terrible consequences, there are yet a few who see the possibility of it being averted, and of mankind ascending to a more exalted state of civilization, where the fullest expression of mental and physical growth is made possible, and where liberty and happiness will become actualities,—an Ideal Society.

In such a society even the privileged of today will find an avenue of escape from the strife and turmoil which surrounds them.

In our unity we form a safe harbor where the victims of capitalistic exploitation, when tossed upon the stormy sea of competition, may find refuge, and our Society will be a beacon lighting the way for the emancipation of the race.

Article I: The name of this association of people shall be The Ideal Society.

Article II: Any person may become a member by a nine-tenths vote of the members present at a regular meeting.

Article III; Sec. 1: Conventions will be held semi-annually, on the first Monday in January and July.

Sec. 2: The convention will be composed of all the trades and professions represented in this Society.

Sec. 3: The action of the convention must receive the approval of nine-tenths of the Society attending meetings designated for the purpose of considering such action.

Article IV: Members of this Society owning shops, real estate, factories, etc., will remain in charge and possession of the same, and conduct their business to suit themselves, considering this Society merely as a customer. But the Society will set the price on all work done by the members in such shops, allowing the owners ample compensation for the use of such shops, and remuneration for personal services rendered at regular membership rates.

Article V: Each member will make out a monthly check in favor of this Society, and, when honored, will receive in exchange an order on any service, article or commodity the Society may hold.

Article VI: The Labor Committee shall receive all applications for help, and will submit them to all those who are willing and able to do the work, and all labor shall be divided equally among all.

Article VII: As long as the members of this Society do not own their tools and materials, they will work under the conditions which they can agree upon with their employers, and will receive their pay in cash, or in orders on the Society.

Article VIII: The pay of the Officers and Committeemen shall be equal to that of all other members.

Article IX: This Society, ignoring property, will not acquire any. It shall remain the agent of the individual members and groups of this organization

Article X: Ten voting members shall constitute a working quorum.

Article XI: These Articles of Agreement can be revised, amended or annulled by a nine-tenths vote of the members present at a regular meeting.

President: Dr. Chas. J. Lewis.
Secretary: Charles Levy.
Treasurer: Arthur C. Westrup.

Infidel Women. Symposium Called For.

A friend in Philadelphia sends us the following and asks that a "symposium," a sitting together in grave conclave, be held in Lucifer's columns, the subject of discussion to be the late syndicate letter of Ella Wheeler Wilcox in reply to the man who expressed himself willing to marry an "infidel woman;" which reply reads as follows:

A widower with four little girls thinks of marrying. He says: "What I want is a true, virtuous woman, if I should remarry, and I do not care if she is an infidel or Christian, for my four girls would at least be taught that virtue was the price of their inheritance."

To me the most repellant object on earth is a woman infidel. She is as unnatural as a flower which breathes poison instead of perfume: as a child which curses, instead of prattles.

Were I a man I could contemplate any existence, however lonely or desolate, in calmness, rather than accept life companionship with a woman devoid of religious belief. I do not understand how any human being faces life without faith.

It is easy enough to face death, if you believe it ends existence; but to face the vicissitudes of life and the death of those who make earth beautiful to you, with no strong divine arm on which to lean—it is an awful thought.

The woman who is to assume the care of four stepdaughters will need the most devout faith in God and His guardian angels to sustain her. She will need to believe in the efficacy of prayer and to send her troubled spirit to God on the wings of prayer every hour of every day if she would meet the demands upon her patience, judgment and good nature.

The woman who does not know the wonderful healing and helping influence of prayer has not yet entered the ante-room of joy.

We do not always get that for which we pray. But we get much more than we pray for in the long run. We get inexpressible comfort and untold strength and fortitude, besides clearer vision and increased patience and wisdom.

Every woman needs all these in her relations to the ordinary events of life. She needs them to impart to men, who are dependent upon her for their best strength and highest attainments.

To be chaste is only one of the feminine virtues.

I have encountered chaste women whom I wanted to flee from, as from a bed of snow. To remain meant to be chilled to death.

It is only where chastity is the white flame from the divine fire of the soul that it is beautiful.

The infidel woman must lack warmth and sympathy—that highest form of sympathy which is not pity—but love and understanding.

To understand our fellow beings we must love them, and love the source from which we all sprang.

It was not chance or accident. One who studies even the rudiments of the marvelous construction of the universe must feel the magnitude of the Great Intelligence which conceived it, and must thrill with reverence for Something we call God! Not the petty, spiteful little beings many churches worship as God—but the Great All Soul of Love! No, no, my mistaken friend, do not marry an infidel woman. Marry a wife whose heart is full of divine love.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

Two principles, however, I have always been steadfast in. I love freedom, and I detest cruelty. Liberty and love will reform the world sooner than any other agency; and, without them, all other agencies will only leave us slavish and debased. —G. W. Foote.

It may prove useful to have learnt from history the elementary lesson that no opinion is true simply because it has been held by the greatest intellects, or by the largest number of human beings, at different periods in the history of the world.—Max Muller.

Love—Jealousy—Murder.

A friend sends us the following lines, credited to the "Emporia (Kan.) Gazette:"

Down in Eldorado [Kan.] not long ago a hussy got a razor and killed a bride for what she called love.

The other day a North Lyon county youth—blew his head off. Why? Love!

Last week in Cimmarron, Kan., a wife shot and killed a flirting husband—she says, for love. In a New York hotel a respectable doctor turned off the gas and killed another man's wife and himself and left a note saying he did it for love. Do you suppose that was really the reason? Was it really love?

A lot of girls in this town sit up until all hours of the night with a lot of boys in this town for what they fancy is love—at least that is what they tell one another. But is it?

A lot of women put up with a lot of mean, onery, grouchy codgers who kick on the gravy, growl because the biscuits are burned, snarl at the coal bills and groan over the imaginary ills of the flesh and these women put up with this for love.

Another woman well known in this town has devoted her life to helping others, to nursing the sick, to caring for the needy; she has refused a dozen offers of marriage that would give a home and plenty to live in comfort. And why?

Well, the boy lover who married her the hour before he went south, fell at Chickamauga; and she calls it love, this self-sacrifice, this life of abnegation. Is it?

What do you think? What is love anyway?

Pilate asked what is truth, and wouldn't wait for an answer. Wise old Pilate; if he had waited for an answer he would have been waiting yet. If he had asked "what is love?" he would have been waiting through all eternity, for no one can tell. Who can know the secrets of the Most High?

Under the head, "The Love that Murders," Richard Le Gallienne contributes a thought-stirring article to the "Chicago American," or rather to the syndicate of press-writers patronized by that journal. The text or occasion for writing this article is the late sensational murder of Mamie Ceralli by Antonio Triolo, in New York.

Mr. Le Gallienne begins by saying that "murders for jealousy are becoming so customary a feature of American life that one begins almost to take them for granted in one's morning paper."

Why then should the case of Mamie Ceralli be singled out as a text for a half column article in metropolitan journals? Because, as the writer explains, "the story of Mamie Ceralli seems so particularly cruel and piteous that one pauses for a moment in front of this one. . . . to exclaim: 'Oh, the pity of it!' and to ponder awhile the mystery of that so-called 'love' that—murders."

After describing the circumstances attending this pitiful tragedy, and saying that "if ever there was a fit subject for lynching on the spot it is Antony Triolo," Mr. Le Gallienne proceeds to comment thus:

But, wild with wrath and pity as such a deed makes one, the philosopher cannot but reflect on the problem that such a "love" as Antonio Triolo's is by no means uncommon in the world, and that, instead of dying out in our "civilized" age, it seems to be rapidly on the increase. For those who love differently this way of loving must necessarily seem strange. Yet I have often heard it said, particularly for women, that those who don't know jealousy know nothing about love. Yet the beginning of jealousy is monopoly, and its end is murder.

Just here I pause to ask each candid reader of Lucifer, if the last sentence quoted from Le Gallienne does not give us the key that unlocks the whole mystery.

What is jealousy but the desire for exclusive ownership? exclusive possession? the desire to the person—the body, the soul, the entire life—of another human being?

Elsewhere in the same article Le Gallienne, correctly, as I think, outlines the higher, the nobler, the more truly human or civilized love, in these words:

He [Antonio Triolo] didn't love her as some might; glad to have her alive, singing and dancing in the sun—or the footlights [she was an actress]—glad to see her happy, though he himself might have no part in her happiness, willing to forego all and suffer all for her sake, realizing his own unworthiness of her, maybe, and daily striving to make himself more worthy. No. Triolo's was another way, the way of egotists of his common type.

Yes "common," alas, too very common is Triolo's style of lover, Triolo's kind of love. Even Ella Wheeler Wilcox—grandly, nobly and truly as she sometimes writes, frequently gives voice to the old, the common, the egotistic the cannibalistic love ideal, the kind of love that so often takes the form of murder, killing the object of love and killing or trying to kill all who stand in the way and thwart the purpose of the egotistic monopolist—as when she closes a recent syndicate article entitled, "Love, when Genuine, is the Same in the Oriental as in the Western Woman's Heart," in words like these:

Education and customs may destroy the power of loving absorbingly and completely, but once that power awakens in a woman's heart its desire is the same, no matter of what land she may be—the desire to be the one possessor of her lover's heart, the one recipient of his caresses. She will like to see him admired and respected by all, to have him a friend to many, but a lover to none but her.

Evidently the one only Ella Wheeler, author of "Poems of Passion" and one of the foremost of living writers, has no conception of the altruistic love ideal as outlined by Le Gallienne, or, if she has any such conception, has no sympathy therewith. If, however, she has a way by which egotistic love, monopolistic love, can be reconciled to and made to work with the altruistic, her readers and admirers would be glad, as I think, to see her solution of the apparent enigma.

That both these phases of love, together with all other phases of attraction and repulsion, have their place in human evolution, is freely admitted, but that the altruistic love, the love that asks no monopoly—the love that never murders, never envies, never hates, but always seeks the happiness of the loved one as its prime object in life—that this love is the later development, the higher, the better, the more truly human, more worthy of the term civilized and enlightened, I verily believe. M. H.

Agnosticism—Gnosticism—Koreshanity.

Under the head, "In the Editorial Perspective," the editor of the "Flaming Sword," U. G. Morrow, has this to say in reply to a plea for "reciprocity," previously made in Lucifer's Columns:

The editor of Lucifer makes a plea for reciprocity—exchange of ideas, courtesies, suggestions, etc., between the advocates of the Koreshan system and himself. Thanks for the suggestion; but we cannot conceive of the possibility of science and agnosticism getting along together very well on any basis, unless the agnostic submits himself to the only kind of reciprocity which truth knows—teaching for obedience. Lucifer may desire to know the truth concerning the things of life; but sometimes its editor makes an accidental slip of the pen, which either belies him or tells the truth. Just how nearly he may come to lining up with the Koreshan plumb-line may be seen from the following: "Whether the Copernican system taught by our fathers and mothers is to be superseded by the 'hollow world' theory—though interesting as a cosmical study—is a matter of small importance when compared with the theologic and ethical aspects of the problem. If with the Cellular Cosmogony we must be chained to the chariot wheels of the Jehovah God of Abraham—'father of the faithful,' who is claimed by Koresh to be his own 'archetype'—and with CYRUS R. TEED for captain-general, then some of us prefer to take to the woods of 'infidel' agnosticism and equal rights for all, and fight it out on that line though it takes all the summers and all the winters of this mortal life." It is obvious that Universology would be of no use to a man whose determinations are to utterly disregard all logical conclusions from the basis of the demonstrated laws of cellular life. Woman, whom Lucifer presumes to teach how to be free, may here observe the expressed purpose of its editor to continue a line of unscientific reform, even in the beginning of the twentieth century!

The above lines have been in type in our office for several weeks, as a text waiting for comment. The needed comment has not been forthcoming for two reasons mainly, first, the press of other, and as I believe more important matter, and second, the difficulty of formulating a suitable answer—an answer that in few words would show the attitude of Lucifer's editor towards a phase of gnosticism, phenomenal if not unparalled for arrogance, for self-conceit, for bigotry, for dogmatic assumption of superior wisdom.

To begin, let me say that controversey, as such, is not to my taste. It is so very, very hard to eliminate the personal element or factor; so easy to lose sight of what should be the only object of discussion—the discovery of truth—and to think mainly of victory in argument. It is so easy to sink the philosopher (lover of wisdom) in the metaphysical wrangler, and hence, as a rule, I much prefer to make a plain, straight-forward statement of principles or opinions, asking each reader and hearer to form her or his own conclusions unbiased by personal or factional considerations.

However, I fully recognize that controversy, criticism, thrust-and-counter-thrust have their legitimate place in the search for truth, and therefore should not be wholly ignored. In order that the best results from such method of search should be realized, it is always best, as I think, to begin with clear definition of terms. Without such definition the investigation is apt to degenerate into a mere war of words, the disputants constantly getting farther and farther apart, instead of approaching a common ground of understanding.

AGNOSTIC—AGNOSTICISM.

While adopting no labels or tags, as such, it is very difficult to avoid them altogether. Names, phrases, titles, all have their limitations and are very apt to be misleading. While not calling myself an agnostic in any technical or partisan sense I have no objection to the term when used in a rational sense. By derivation the word means one who does not know—from the Greek verb "to know" and "a" meaning NOT. That is to say, an agnostic is one who does not know everything, and is honest enough to confess his lack of universal knowledge.

In this sense, the etymologic sense, I freely acknowledge myself an agnostic. I claim that every honest student is an agnostic. I claim that conscious, honest, agnosticism is essential to all progress. It is the beginning of wisdom. It is akin to the saying, "Doubt is beginning of wisdom." Hence to be an agnostic is to be a doubter, a SKEPTIC. The origin of the word skeptic is to look, to see, to investigate, hence to try to find out that concerning which we are in doubt.

GNOSTIC—GNOSTICISM.

These words mean, of course, the exact opposite of Agnosticism. The gnostic is one who knows; one who KNOWS IT ALL! He does not need to investigate.—Why should he? Hence to him there is no further progress in the realm of science—knowledge.

The Koreshans do not call themselves gnostics, but by their attitude towards agnostics they necessarily "line up" with the gnostics. That this is their true mental alignment we have only to read their books and papers. In the utterance just quoted Mr. Morrow declares himself a gnostic of the gnostics—a gnostic of the most inveterate, not to say INCURABLE type. If further evidence of this fact is needed, take the following from their chief text book. "Cellular Cosmogony." In answer to the question, "What is on the outside of the hollow globe you call the earth," Mr. Morrow and "Koresh" reply:

The shell of the earth is the circumference—the limit of the universe. It environs all that exists. Outside of the environ or limit of existence, there is nothing. There is no infinite space. Space is measure and dimension of things that are; it is definite. Limitation is a factor of form; form is a factor of existence. Hence if the universe exists it is limited, beyond which there is no existence. There is nothing on the outside—no heat, cold, light, darkness, temperature, condition, entity, quality of substance—nothing. There couldn't be. Nothing cannot extend at all; matter could not extend eternally. No matter how absurd this may be to the average person, sufficient thought on the problem will reveal the fact that our conclusions as to what is not on the outside are reasonable, logical and absolute.

If this is not gnosticism, in its baldest form, then it would be hard to imagine anything more unblushingly gnostic. Often have I heard "Koresh"—Cyrus R. Teed, use words like, these:

"WE HAVE GOT IT ALL! It is impossible to know any subject till we know its relations to all other subjects; hence to know anything is to know everything."

As to whether Lucifer's editor shows "a determination to disregard all logical conclusions from the basis of demonstrated laws" or not, let Lucifer's readers decide. We all know that the best way to get at a man's mental and moral status is to get him to talk of other people. Invariably he gives a reading of HIMSELF!—his own inner consciousness.

In this connection I will ask all readers of this week's Lucifer to hunt up the two last issues and read the articles, "Reaction against Materialism" and "The Rise and Persistence of Hierarchies." These were both written with reference to this discussion of "Teedism"—Koreshanity.

To close for this week I insert part of a letter, one of many written us some weeks ago in reference to the religious and "scientific" claims of the founders and expounders of a cult or ism that is now receiving considerable attention from thoughtful people, here in Chicago and elsewhere.

Permit me to thank you for your kind explanations, Lucifer under date of 26th ult. Before I received this copy I asked "Flaming Sword" to explain origin of meteors. Another series of questions went forward yesterday, with request for public answer in case they had never been asked before: "Have not straight lines been projected by engineers? Is it not a fact that in the construction of long tunnels, that at times the work is carried on from both sides of the mountain, the tunnels meeting midway, the sides approximating with great accuracy? Is not this the driving of a straight line through solid rock as it were? If the tunnels be driven from equal altitudes above sea level, and meet in the center; would the tunnel under present engineering practice be straight, or would it curve in conformity with the curvature of the earth's surface? If straight could a person using a powerful telescope at one end, directing its axis parallel with the sides of the tunnel, see through the tunnel?" Kindly take no present notice of the foregoing questions, but would ask that you wait and see what disposition is made of them by Prof. Morrow. In meantime will appreciate any comment you can make on them yourself.

Understand I want to be common sense, actual and factual as it were, and along this line wish to serve humanity. Do not wish to go wandering off into space,—this whether space is within or without our earth. The question of the form of the earth's surface is however one of surpassing interest. . . . . Why does not Teed, instead of wandering off into space and occult things, and leaving the common sense things to be discovered by others, why does he not outline his work in a practical manner? There must certainly be some practical method of demonstrating the shape of the surface of the earth.

Next week, time and space permitting, some attempt will be made to show why I do not accept the "scientific," and theologic and moralistic tenets of the Koreshans.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Mrs. A. P. M., Iowa:—Please send me Albert Chavannes two books, "Vital Force," and "Magnetation and its Relation to Health and Character." Would like many other books and hope to get some from time to time. I am quite of your way of thinking but can't open my mouth here on these subjects. We live in the midst of a lot of English who think marriage is a true representation of Christ's union with the church. Quite a slur on the union in many cases.

A. B. Clarkson, Montreal, Can.:—I regret to see, nay, let me be honest and say that I am disgusted and sick at heart to see that the "movement in favor of cruelty"—the inquisition of torture—still finds a prominent place in Lucifer, the last place in the world where it ought to find support. Instead of assisting to "boost" the claims of those dogmatic and cruel quacks of the medical world I think it would be more in keeping with the principles Lucifer has always stood for if you were to get on the other side and fight for liberty and justice. I hold that Doctordom is second only to parsondom and priestcraft as a monopolistic tyranny to be fought tooth and nail by all radicals. There is hardly a state in the Union or in Canada where they are not organized to look after their own interests and defend their blunders and ignorance against society and to prevent others who are more successful in the healing art from practicing. I have known many people who never saw the inside of a medical college or vivisection hell, cure the worst possible cases that had gone the round of every medical expert among the regulars and been given up to die and very many people have the same experience almost every day.

I have always thought the Harmans were much above the average "human" in sanity and horse sense hence I regretfully conclude that such articles have to be published for some unexplained reason, for I cannot believe that defense of vivisection meets with your approval. Pardon my plain speaking. You would not wonder at it if you had studied this infernal subject as I have and realized as I do that it is the most diabolical and devilish practice in the universe and as Ingersoll well said, the very lowest depths of depravity that the human mind can descend to.

[The above strongly worded protest is inserted for the same reason that the paragraph in defense of vivisection was published, namely, because Lucifer's platform is the freest of the free, giving to all subjects a fair hearing. It is scarcely true that "the inquisition of torture finds a prominent place in Lucifer." So far as I now recall, one correspondent only,—C. L. James—has defended vivisection as a justifiable method of extending the limits of human knowledge. Others have as freely condemned it. For myself, alone, I maintain that no act is, of itself, wrong, criminal or wicked. The intent and the probable result of any act should justify or condemn it. Whether, under this definition, vivisection is ever justifiable, is a question I prefer not to assert or to deny. I have a horror of the needless infliction of pain, but would freely bare my own arm to the vivisector's knife if convinced that human happiness and progress might be materially or permanently enhanced thereby. M. H.]

J. C. Anderson, Avoca, Iowa:—I was greatly interested in the pamphlets I sent to you for—"Love in Freedom" and "Regeneration of Society," and will again send a dime and ask for "Marriage and Morality" and "New Hedonism." I would like to know something about the Light-Bearer Library. Is it a Monthly, containing articles on different subjects? Your literature suits me. Where shall we get our religion if we all get to be Rationalists? Your literature would probably explain.

[Yes, our weekly Lucifer and our monthly Light-Bearer Library, together with other pamphlets and books published by us, explain our views on religion as well as in regard to morals and economics. Lucifer is $1 per year of fifty-two numbers, the Light-Bearer Library is fifty cents per year of twelve numbers, five cents single copy. To new subscribers both publications will be sent one year for $1.25. In clubs of five or more Lucifer will be sent for fifty cents per year, of fifty-two numbers, or less than one cent per copy. M. H.]

Frank D. Blue, Terre Haute, Ind.:—I send you a clipping that is up to time. Thought you might use it. The last No. of Lucifer [854] is a "hummer." Keep it up. Platt's article would be hard to beat. I'm busy as ever trying to teach a little truth about blood-poisoning, and it's slow work, but nevertheless rebellion is on the increase everywhere. So I know the fruit is ripening. Am going to make some improvements in "Vaccination" next month—April.

[Thanks for clipping. Our friends can greatly assist us by sending clippings from current literature having special relation to Lucifer's central work. Bro. Blue is Secretary of the "Anti-Vaccination Society of America," and edits the monthly journal of that Society, called "Vaccination," published at the very low price of twenty-five cents per year. It has always been worth much more than the price asked, but now we have the promise of improvements next month. That thousands of people die every year as the direct result of vaccine virus injected into the blood is doubtless true. It is hoped that our readers will help spread the light on this much neglected but vastly important subject. M. H.]

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

NOW READY. JUST OUT.

DR. FOOTE'S NEW BOOK.

THE HOME CYCLOPEDIA
OF POPULAR MEDICAL, SOCIAL, AND SEXUAL SCIENCE.

Contains a full, plain, and easy reading treatise on "Health and Disease, with Recipes," all the average reader can profitably learn of personal hygiene and common diseases (including special, separate chapters for men and women); all right up to date, and fully illustrated with hundreds of photo-engravings and chromo-lithographs. Contains also the already popular "Plain Home Talk" about the relations of the sexes and social customs in all ages, and all countries, with "original and startling" suggestions for social reforms; newly revised, enlarged, and well illustrated. All is "heart to heart" plain home talk from a clear-thinking, plain-speaking, liberal minded medical author of over forty years experience. Nearly 1 000 000 of his former books sold. A curious book for curious people, and a sensible book for every one. Answers 1,000 delicate questions one would like to ask his regular physician and yet doesn't want to.

1,200 pages, 400 illustrations, 9 in colors, 200 recipes. Price, Cloth bound, $2, mailed. Address Lucifer Office, 109 Fulton St. Chicago.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers; 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul, "Another true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents, Cloth bound $1,

RIGHTS OF WOMEN
AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. By E. C. Walker. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"A WOMAN in order to live the purest life, must be FREE, must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially."—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD," by Henry Olerich. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 400 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy Price $1. For sale at this office.

Freethought Ideal, Edited by Etta Semple, is published fort-nightly at Ottawa, Kansas. It is the only atheistic paper in the world edited and published by a woman. Fifty cents per year. Samples free.

DO YOU EVER THINK

Of the fate of the Prodigal Daughter? The Prodigal Son is forgiven and received with rejoicing—why should different treatment be accorded to his sister? For a vivid, true picture of the conditions in homes and factories which produce thousands of so-called fallen women every year, read "The Prodigal Daughter; or, The Price of Virtue," by Rachel Campbell. Price, 25 cents.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Lucifer, the Light-Bearer, will be sent free for thirteen weeks with each order for "The Prodigal Daughter." Address M. HARMAN, 500 Fulton Street, Chicago, Ill.

Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness who addresses humanity.—From the Preface.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

By Grant Allen. "The Old Asceticism said: 'Be Virtuous and You Will Be Happy.' The New Hedonism says: 'Be Happy and You Will Be Virtuous.'" This is the key note of Grant Allen's Masterpiece. 30 large pages, five cents For sale at this office.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo. 172 pages. Price 25 cents.

The Sanctity of Marriage, As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution, its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work, Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents; for sale at this office.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. B. Foote's time-tried handbook, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., No. 10. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, MARCH 23, E. M. 301. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE No. 857

Out of the Night.

Out of the Night that covers me,
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever gods may be
For my unconquerable soul!

In the fell clutch of Circumstance
I have not winced, or cried aloud;
Under the bludgeonings of Chance
My head is bloody, but unbowed!

Beyond this vale of wrath and tears
Looms but the horror of the Shade;
And yet the menace of the years
Finds, and shall find me, unafraid!

It matters not how strait the gate—
How charged with punishments the scroll,
I am the Master of my fate—
I am the Captain of my soul!

—Selected.

Free Love, Free Maternity.*

Marriage is practiced everywhere and always under conditions which are absurd, odious, and oppressive; it has had the result, in an immense majority of cases, in changing the joys of love into an atrocious double and reciprocal slavery; so many and frequent have have been the vain efforts to ameliorate it that it is not astonishing so great a number of thinkers have long since adopted the only radical and efficacious solution—the complete freedom of love.

Among the works in which this thesis is maintained, I am pleased to cite in the first instance, the remarkable book, "Elements de Science Sociale, by a doctor of medicine, published in 1854, in English and translated into many languages.

One chapter is audaciously entitled: "Poverty its only cause and remedy!" (1.) The cause is marriage; the remedy is. . . . . sterile love (the author employs a more precise expression that I dare not reproduce). This is a big book, compact, very stuffed with facts and arguments; it is of the order that light-spirited people read seldom.

On the contrary, l'Evangile du Bonheur published two years ago by Armand Charpentier, is a work than which there is none more agreeable for all to read, thanks to its elegant, clear, and concise style. But if it indicates so well the evil, the remedy that it proposes. simply free love, is a solution that it is necessary to complete.

Others have tackled but a part of the problem in combating legal marriage and replacing it by the free union; the free should, according to their light, offer chances of duration, of constancy, equal or superior to marriage which has been consecrated by authority. Paul Lacombe defends this idea in the book already old, le Marriage Libre.

Better still, a large number of couples, propagandizing by the deed; have recorded with Eclat their free writings in which all ceremonies were absent, or the act has been simply accompanied by family ceremonials.

In France we can cite the unions of the daughters of Elisee Reclus; in England those of E. Lanchester, of Wastall. . . . .

These new unions, we must agree, are cleared of a most abominable feature, but all the germs of suffering which render marriage detestable still adhere to them.

Naturally neophobes of all kinds do not cease to protest against that which they call in mildest terms the most dissolute and shameless act (debergoudage), as if our actual, legal, official society, affecting right-living, respectability etc., was the impeccable collection of all the virtues, including that unique and so foolish one of woman—chastity.

I don't wish to pause for a single instant over objections of a theological origin that are put forward against free love. Whoso seeks the happiness of man very quickly rejects the idea of an impotent and ferocious God, created by the terrorised imagination of primitive men, exploited by the cute, conserved by an ill-thought sentiment, ideas having no practical utility; but, quite on the contrary, coming after the question of over-population and the misery resulting therefrom, as the second cause of the innumerable and horrible butcheries of which history furnishes the record.

To the frankly theological objections are related those of the metaphysicians who would impose upon humanity certain ideals of morality which satisfy their own prejudices, but not at all the legitimate aspiration of the masses after happiness as they understand it.

The only serious objection is that of the position of children outside the pretended legal protection, and, no matter what those who have not well calculated the matter may think, the objection would exist even it a communistic society, the moment it was freed from material preoccupation. The answer to the objection is alike as to the hypothesis of this ideal society as in the reality of present day individualist society: freedom of love presupposes freedom of maternity.

Woman should have, I do not say the right, for I no longer know what this old word, used to the point of abuse, signifies, but she should have the power and science only to be a mother when after mature reflection she shall have resolved to so become.

I believe I was the first to have clearly affirmed this unique solution at the woman's Congress at Paris (April 1896), and at the 2nd. Congress to Protect and Increase the Population (Dec. 1896), this last organised by the society of a dozen members that its creator and secretary modestly calls: "Alliance des Savants et des philantrophes de tous les pays."

I sum up my doctrine from the feminine viewpoint: A young girl makes a mistake to marry, to alienate the little liberty that she possesses. Let her remain as much as possible the mistress of herself, let her choose freely her female and male companions; and in order that her liberty may be respected on this point, she should carefully respect that of others, and that each girl should herself commence the reform of the pretended "public opinion" which mixes itself up with that which in no wise concerns it, and is more tyrannical than are the positive laws themselves.

She does not disobey any rational law in having the lovers which please her, but she commits a grave fault against true morality if she haphazardly creates children for which the education and up-bringing are not properly assured.

Those who have really at heart the happiness of young women ought not to stop them from knowing that science furnishes them with the means of being mothers only when they themselves desire it.

Freedom of maternity is the indispensable condition of freedom in love. It should have no other guides than physiological science and sexual prudence.

If, after a more or less number of experiences, she finds a companion with whom, in perfect conformity of culture and tastes, she thinks she might pass a long and happy life, let her associate, if it so please her, altogether with him; without bothering about the vain legal sanctions; and let her have the incomparable happiness of having children that she will be sure of being able to well provide for; and that these children bear her name alone.

Many gynecologists teach that it is not well for a woman to become a mother previous to the age of twenty-five, and it is quite evident that her very natural desires of gentleness and love will not await this age.

If the loved companion who is definitely chosen realizes the dreamed-of ideal, which is the rarest of events in legal marriage of today, it will not be necessary to force him by law to take a hand with the mother in all manners and with all his strength, in the bringing up and education of the beloved offspring.

If by misfortune, the lovers are mistaken in each other, if the harmony does not last, if there be incompatability of temper, if they separate, the love will not be succeeded, as now-a-days, by hatred and horror, but rather by friendship, or, at least esteem. And the honest man will not fail to contribute his proper share towards the material well-being of the fruits of his former loves.

If, after all precautions, a woman should have united with a rogue, she will separate from him, taking the children of which she will have solely the charge and direction, very unhappy no doubt, but not having her real misfortune augmented by the artificial tortures which oppressive laws would have further brought to bear upon her.

Remaining a major, sole mistress of her children, she will not have been made the slave of a tyrant who could with impunity molest her, within certain very broad limits, steal from her legally the fruit of her work, her savings, the bread of her children, her own.

The degenerates with tyrannical instincts, deprived of the support of the pernicious laws, by the proper initiative of woman, by her abstaining from legal marriage, would lose forcibly their brutality and would become humanized.

[TO BE CONCLUDED]

Anarchists and Their Critics.

BY J. S. ODEGAARD.

Charles C. Moore, editor of the "Blue Grass Blade," is at present busily engaged in looking over dictionaries to find the true meaning of Anarchists and Anarchism. Thirty or forty years ago he was just as busily engaged in looking over the Bible to find the true meaning of Christians and Christianity.

It is hard to make modern philosophers out of clergymen. They advance so far, but no farther. Their training in early youth seems to disqualify them for the broad sphere of modern philosophy. Mr. Moore seems not to be more capable of distinguishing the difference between the philosophical Anarchists of America and the ignorant slaves of priestcraft and kingcraft of Europe—called Anarchists, than are the average plutocratic editors of our big dailies, who in many instances no doubt are paid to keep the public from the fountains of knowledge.

Once upon a time, so goes the story, a group of wise men met in convention to decide how many teeth there were in a horse's mouth. After consulting many books upon this subject they failed to agree, and the meeting was about to break up without any result when an unsophisticated countryman arose and suggested that they bring in a horse and examine his mouth. The assembly arose as one man and stoned the countryman for heresy.

Now, I am sure Bro. Moore would not stone a heretic and so consider myself safe in suggesting to him that he examine some of the American philosophical Anarchists instead of a lot of dictionaries which have been written by men who no doubt were scholars, but perhaps not worthy the name of philosophers.

Personally I have no doubt but that the philosophical Anarchists are hundreds of years ahead of their time; but we must recognise the fact that Ideas always precede Practice, and that many of our present day customs and laws were once considered impracticable.

Whether the doctrines of the philosophical Anarchists ever will become practicable is neither here nor there. This question must be solved by time and the anarchists themselves. However, I think that almost any doctrine can be made practicable if the masses of the people only believe in it, when we remember that such contradictions of natural fact as the doctrines of Christianity, Priestianity, and Churchianity, have been able to gain recognition for practicability.

As to the violent anarchists, so-called, they are the product of the vineyards of priestcraft and kingcraft; and a notable fact of late years is that a vast majority of these have been Italians—natives of a country which has been most blessed with the infallible pope and his infallible creed; and judging by this very fact it seems to me that the present day Priestianity and Churchianity are not a success as promoters of justice and peace on earth.

The chief basis of government, both by priests and kings, is ignorance and fear; and as the sun of enlightenment and education slowly arises so is there, during this process, bound to come forth a lot of half-blind creatures who go wrong and do wrong. But this is only the pain society feels before the birth of the new age. Whether this yet unborn Age will be civilized or barbarian, time and coming history alone will reveal.

The above lines have been written not from any aversion toward Mr. Moore, nor in defense of or criticism of any school of Anarchism, but rather in defense of toleration and fair play. There is too much of bitter ridicule of opponents, at the present day, and not enough of toleration, fair play, logic and truth. While I do not deny that ridicule may sometimes do good yet it is the hard logical truth that is the more lasting, and when we are convinced that our opponents are honest I think it bad taste to use ridicule against them.

Only, as I think, when an opponent has so much self-interest in a cause that by defending it he may reasonably be suspected of dishonesty, is ridicule justifiable.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

They are usually put on to hide a spot that's bald and bare.

The Infidel Wife.

Josephine K. Henry, in "Cincinnati Times Star."

In the "Times Star" of February 21 is printed an article by Ella Wheeler Wilcox on the subject of "Women and Religion." A widower with four daughters writes a letter to E. W. W., who seems to have constituted herself general supervisor of the social, political, religious and solar systems, and through the press plays the triple role of private investigator, public adviser and general counselor. The widower writes for advice and gets it. He says:

"What I want is a true, virtuous woman, if I should remarry, and I do not care if she be an infidel or Christian, for my four girls would at least be taught that virtue was the price of their inheritance."

Ella begins her advice thus: "To me the most repellant object on earth is a woman infidel." That is as much as to say she tolerates the man infidel just a little bit. Of course, Ella means that the woman who does not believe in the clay man, rib woman, loquacious snake, and that her sex is the cause of all the sin and sorrow in the world, though she be honest in her convictions, truthful, chaste, useful and kindly, is more repellant to her than the faith-laden woman who never had a conviction, who would not know a truth if she met it face to face, and whose sins are scarlet and every other color.

"Faith covers a multitude of sins." She says she "does not understand how any human being faces life without faith." If she will observe women and men about her she will see how thousands of them face life with faith. "There are many things in heaven and earth that have never been dreamed of in Ella's philosophy." The Bible says: "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." "The substance of things hoped for and the evidence of things not seen" are about the most illusive and delusive chimeras that ever possessed the human mind, and we fail to recognize that they are essential to a woman who is to become the stepmother to four stepdaughters. What is pure, unadulterated faith to one person is often rank infidelity to another.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox has her ideas of the mysteries of life by which she is surrounded, and we would not dispute her fee simple title to these mental belongings, but no other human being has exactly the same ideas, so she is likely to run upon "the most repellant object on earth to her, the infidel woman," every time she meets one of her own sex.

She says: "Were I a man I would contemplate any existence, however lonely, rather than accept life companionship with a woman devoid of religious belief." According to this, a woman who unburdens her sin-laden soul to her father confessor, a believer in Swinefurth, Dowie, Mormonism, or the Amish creed, will make a better and more companionable wife than a woman who, in the majesty of her mental integrity, says: "The mystery of life and death is too deep for my finite mind. I cannot divine the source or the destiny of all I see about me in this world. I can only do my duty to my fellows in the here and now. I must wait for the revelations of nature."

Again, she says: "The woman who is to assume the care of four step-daughters will need the most devout faith in God and His guardian angels, to sustain her. She will need to believe in the efficacy of prayer, and to send her troubled spirit to God on the wings of prayer every hour of every day, if she would meet the demands upon her patience, judgment and good humor." That God needs guardian angels and has them, is a piece of information that must have been sent from divine headquarters by special delivery to E. W. W. The woman who becomes stepmother to four stepdaughters must, in our humble opinion, not only have faith in God and His guardian angels, but she should have sublime faith in herself. She will not only have to believe in the efficacy of prayer, but in the efficacy and absolute need of works. Of course if she spends "every hour of the day sending her troubled spirit to God on wings of prayer," as Ella says she must, we fail to see what this woman would have left to be a companionable wife and good stepmother. What with the actual praying and keeping the "wings of prayer" in soaring condition, the duties of wife and mother would necessarily have to be neglected, and it might come about that the husband might run upon something in the line of "Love's Labor Lost," or "Paradise Lost" in the course of time; and regret that he had not chosen a wife who would manifest her faith by her works.

Yet after this faith-laden woman spends "every hour of every day in prayer," this writer says, "we do not always get that for which we pray." To pray unceasingly for wisdom to rear four stepdaughters, and not get it, and still have the tangled problem of stepmotherhood to solve, would be discouraging indeed; but from childhood (and I speak not with irreverence), it has always seemed to me presumption to ask the unchangeable to change, or to suggest to the Almighty how this little world ought to be run.

Again, Ella says: "The infidel woman must lack warmth and sympathy." Has she gauged the warmth and sympathy in her own nature, when she says "the most repellant object on earth to me is a woman infidel?" Is she dead sure she knows as much about "God," "Divine Love," "The Great All Soul" and the lack of warmth and sympathy in women who do not possess the celestial knowledge vouchsafed to her?

Yet Ella Wheeler Wilcox asserts that she "does not believe in the petty, spiteful, little being many churches worship as God." If these churches put the brand of "infidel woman" upon this poetess, who "leans hard upon the Eternal Breast" and upon the "Swerveless Force," she might pray in vain to The Great All Soul to save her from becoming "the most repellant object on earth, an infidel woman."

Secularizing Sunday.

A friend sends us a clipping from the Alliance (Ohio) "Leader" from which we learn that "at a meeting of the Independent Church" of that place the following resolution was unanimously adopted by a large audience:

Resolved. That we note with satisfaction that a session of congress was held on Sunday, March 3 as being a hopeful sign of the times tending toward a broader liberalism and a return of the lawmaking power to the spirit of the constitution, which makes this a secular government. Though tolerant of all religions this is in no sense a Christian government, as expressly stated by President Washington in his treaty with Tripoli. Though Sunday is a national rest day, it should never be considered as distinctively Christian and set apart to foster our popular superstition, as Thomas Jefferson called the Christian religion, especially as the majority in the nation are freethinkers agnostics, Jews, Seventh-day Baptists, spiritualists and people of no religious belief.

It is now said that "appropriation bills" amounting to some three hundred millions of dollars were signed by the "executive" on Sunday, and it is feared by those chiefly interested that this fact will make these bills worthless and that an extra session of congress will have to be called to pass bills to take the place of those rendered invalid by such Sunday work.

These pointers are interesting mainly as showing that a conflict is coming, in the near future, over the question as to whether the United States is a Christian nation, and whether we are to have a formal and acknowledged union of church and state, such as now exists in most European countries.

Whether the conflicting sects of Christians of the United States can be sufficiently unified to agree upon the details of such avowed union of church and state remains to be seen.

If the story of the Fall is not the true record of a historical occurrence, what becomes of Pauline theology? Yet the story of the Fall as directly conflicts with probability, and is as devoid of trustworthy evidence as that of the creation and that of the deluge, with which it forms a harmoniously legendary series.—Huxley.

Lucifer's Purpose.

Occasionally a letter comes to this office worded something like this:

Please find enclosed ten cents; send me "What the Young Need to Know." I want to understand what your scheme of life really is. Having—some years ago—worked with Comstock in trying to rid society of the influence of those people who—for the money in it—are seeking to foster the already prevalent sex-mania, I have felt some surprise at some things in the sample copies of Lucifer, and it is difficult to ascertain your real position, which I must, confess from my standpoint looks like a "straddle." Yours for truth, whichever way it lead.

N. E. ARNOLD.

Daytona, Florida, March 5, 1901.

Briefly replying I would say that in a general way Lucifer's purpose is outlined at the top of its editorial page every week. Lucifer as its name indicates, "stands for Light against Darkness; for Reason against Superstition; for Science against Tradition; for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance; for Liberty against Slavery and for Justice against Privilege."

If this is not sufficiently definite and specific I would say, that as our space is quite limited, we give prominence to that phase of Enlightenment that to us seems most needed, namely, discussions and investigations concerning the basic or underlying causes of the poverty, the vice, the crime, the injustice and the slaveries that now afflict the race of humankind.

After giving much time and careful study to all the phases of reform now in vogue, some of us are thoroughly convinced that much of this reformatory effort is injudicious, unsatisfactory and hence fruitless of satisfactory results.

Take some recent object lessons, for example, here in the big city called Chicago. Just one week ago, within a ten minutes walk from Lucifer's sanctum, a boiler explosion occurred wrecking more than half a block of stores and dwellings, killing nine persons and seriously if not fatally wounding more than fifty others. As it happened, only a few of the large force of employes in the laundry were on duty, else the loss of life would have been far greater. Investigations in regard to responsibility for the terrible disaster are said to be in progress, but whatever be the result of such investigation, judging from all past history of such cases, little if anything will be done to prevent like occurrences in the future—and WHY?

Simply because human life is CHEAP and money DEAR!

Take another recent example: At two o'clock Thursday night of last week, one of the engines of Chicago's fire department planted itself on our particular corner within a few yards of our sleeping rooms, and for the rest of the night made sleep impossible by the noise, pumping water to extinguish a fire in a five story manufacturing establishment in the next block. At daylight a half dozen engines or more were still playing on the smoldering flames. Luckily no lives were lost and only the one building seriously damaged—loss one hundred thousand dollars. Snow was falling at the time and snow and sleet lay deep on the shingle roofs of the neighboring houses, as well as on an adjoining lumber yard. Had the weather been dry and windy nothing could have prevented a fearful loss of buildings and other property and perhaps of human life as well. Origin of the fire not known, but report says there was no night-watchman to guard the premises; that it was due to the alarm given by a young man returning from his club that the neighborhood escaped the horrors of a general conflagration.

As it is, a large number of employes, poor men dependent on daily wages to keep themselves and families from dire want, are thrown out of employment with no hope of re-employment by the same company for months, if ever. For, with overproduction (under-consumption) in all lines of industry, capitalists are in no haste to rebuild their burned factories.

These are but two of the many similar object lessons constantly occurring in this and all other great cities, all going to show that human life is cheap and money dear.

One of the pitiable sights, these winter mornings—often before daylight—is to see troops of young girls, some of them scarcely half grown, hurrying with short, quick steps, lest they should be a minute late at the big shops, and thus lose part of their meager pay, and perhaps be notified that their services are no longer needed. Capitalism, commercialism, finds that there is more money to be made by employing girls and women, and so the men and boys vainly tramp the streets, the highways and byways, in search of a job; some of them, in sheer desperation, becoming burglars, pick-pockets, incendiaries, highway robbers, train-wreckers, etc., etc. Others sell themselves, body and soul, for thirteen dollars a month, and cross the ocean to butcher their fellow human beings against whom they can have no possible feeling of hate or ill-will.

WHAT AND WHERE IS THE REMEDY?

The church prescribes the "blood of Jesus"—teaching us to follow the example and precepts of one who led the life of a tramp, and taught his followers to "take no thought for the morrow," to "resist not evil," etc. Our economic reformers have a multitude of specifics, each of which is recommended as a panacea for human ills,—such as government ownership of public utilities; single tax on land values; statute prohibition of the liquor traffic; free trade; "fiat" money, etc., etc., forgetting or ignoring the basic truth that that man makes institutions, and that since like produces like man must be made better before his institutions can be made permanently better.

Abraham Lincoln said, "Labor is before Capital and is superior to it." With equal truth he might he might have said that labor is the creator of capital, and that capital can have no rights as against its creator. Likewise we can truthfully say that man (generic man) is the creator of institutions and that institutions can have no right as against their creator. The state, the church, our land system, our money system, our marriage system, etc., are, one and all, institutions made by man, and can have no rights as against the rights of any individual person, woman or man.

There can be no collective rights, majority rights, as such. Upon this fiction, this superstition, is founded the doctrine that the state—the nation, "society," the majority, has rights superior to those of indivldual persons, and that when there is a conflict between them the rights of the state—the majority—"are paramount and must extinguish" the rights of individual persons. Upon this fiction have been founded most if not all the despotisms and slaveries that have cursed mankind.

And now a few words directed especially to my questioner, and to all who like him have "worked with Anthony Comstock" in his famous nineteenth century "Movement in Favor of Ignorance"—his famous (or infamous) crusade against freedom of speech and of press. Whether this crusade has been worked "for the money in it," the glory of it, or from a sincere desire to do good to others, is not for me to say, but if a tree is to be known by its fruits then this crusade, its leaders and its followers, are not good. That there is "sex-mania," sex-perversion, and that it causes untold crime and misery is too sadly true, but it requires little thought or investigation to see that suppression of the knowledge of evil is not the best way to cure that evil; that forcible suppression of knowledge is the surest way to perpetuate and aggravate the disease sought to be cured. "Ignorance is the only darkness," "Ignorance is the only devil," are axiomatic truths that seem not yet to have been grasped by the leaders and abettors of the Comstockian crusade against the freedom to know, and the freedom to grow, in nature's way.

To close, for this week, our little talk concerning Lucifer's purpose—Lucifer's "scheme of life"—I will revert to one more object lesson, one that came under my own immediate observation, eleven years ago, in Topeka, Kansas. In the Federal court room of that city I happened to be present when the judge imposed a sentence of five years imprisonment in the penitentiary and a fine of three hundred dollars, upon an editor for an alleged violation of the Federal law of which the putative father is the same Comstock with whom N. E. Arnold claims the honor of working. When delivering himself of this sentence—phenomenal in its severity, the judge was careful to make it plain that the chief offence of the prisoner was his opposition to one of the most honored and cherished of all the institutions of modern society—the MARRIAGE institution.

This was the head and front of the said editor's offending—the real gravamen of his alleged crime. Among other indicted articles the one that was regarded as worst was a letter from a correspondent showing that marriage condones and protects the crime of RAPE. That rape in wedlock is impossible, inconceivable. That an assault that would be punishable under the statute by imprisonment, or by death without law WAS NO CRIME AT ALL if committed by the husband, since by the legal maxim, "once consent means always consent!"

And thus it is that while a man cannot be punished for rape in wedlock the man, the editor, who dares to expose this crime to public gaze, tries to arouse the dormant public conscience to a sense of the terrible consequences to womanhood, to motherhood and to childhood, of such ownership of woman by man,—this editor could be sent to prison for five years and condemned to pay a fine of three hundred dollars for his offense against the holy institution of marriage.

The older readers of Lucifer will probably recognize in the editor, prosecuted for assault upon the marriage institution, the writer of these lines, and will therefore agree that he has the very best of reasons for remembering the object lesson thus briefly described.

And now that we are challenged by more than one correspondent "to give a reason for the faith that is in us"—to show the purpose for which Lucifer has struggled and battled for more than a score of years; for which it has endured many things and still survives, I think it best to continue in succeeding issues something of a history of the prolonged fight in the Kansas courts for the right to freely discuss the question whether the rights of man (generic man) or those of his institutions are of first and greatest importance.

With Lowell some of us are willing to say:

I honor the man who is willing to sink
Half his present repute for the freedom to think,
And when he has thought, be his cause strong or weak,
Will sink t'other half for the freedom to speak;
Not caring what vengeance the mob has in store—
Be that mob the upper ten thousand or lower.

Emma Goldman's Lecture Tour.

A card from Emma Goldman, of New York, the well known lecturer on sociologic and governmental subjects, informs us that she is about to start on a lecture tour through the United States, making Philadelphia her first stop. She requests that all who wish one or more lectures will let her know at once, so that she may arrange dates, routes, etc. It is sincerely hoped that the responses to this announcement will be both numerous and prompt. Elsewhere in this issue will be found a report of a recent lecture at the Manhattan Liberal Club, New York, by one who is, perhaps, surpassed by no other lecturer for effective work in demolishing old-time superstitions whether of church, state or conventional morality.

Emma Goldman at the Manhattan Liberal Club.

BY C. W. C.

Emma Goldman (the "divine Emma," as some people call her) presented her views on the question of vice to a very large, intelligent, and appreciative audience, fully half of which consisted of women, at a recent meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club,

She treated the subject of vice with great earnestness and frankness. She commenced by saying that no act which is entered upon voluntarily by one or several persons could be called vicious. Ignorance upon the sex question exists not only among conservatives, but also among radicals. We often see Liberal men whose minds are not entirely free and who still cling to some superstitions. Not long ago, when Oscar Wilde's case attracted attention, the accused was condemned by people who did not understand the case at all. We may try to avoid it, and yet it is a fact that hundreds of men and women have desires different from those of ordinary persons. Some of the greatest men of the age are addicted to homosexuality. Havelock Ellis and other distinguished scientists have devoted con siderable time to the study of this question, and their conclusion is that some of those people acquire the habit as a result of not being allowed to associate with the opposite sex, while others are born with such tastes.

People indulge in abnormal practices because they lack the opportunity of normal relations; because we have Comstock to prevent people from acquiring sexual knowledge, and because to some extent, we all are hypocrites. Some of the language of Shakespere and Rabelais cannot be used to-day; but a spade should be called a spade. When men give a corrupted meaning to certain words, the trouble is not in the words, but in the minds of the men. Ideas do not spoil men, but men spoil ideas.

We have today a moral crusade in this city, and yet if any people have no right to crusade against vice, it is the very ones who are engaged in the movement. The religion of these people is responsible for the present conditions. Christianity introduced vice into the world by attempting to regulate the relations of the sexes.

Prostitution is not confined to women. We find moral lepers in Congress, the White House, Wall Street and Fifth avenue as well as in the slums. The man who sells his mind is no better than the woman who sells her body. The difference is in grade, not in substance. Prostitution is produced by our false system of education, by our ridiculous moral standard, and by our economic conditions. Young people know nothing about themselves; they are kept in ignorance. Olive Schreiner says that man is taught to be something, while woman is instructed to look nice, to have a good figure and a handsome face; and the result is that we have, not women of character, but dolls.

We condemn the woman who sells herself, but what about the man? Is it a greater crime for a woman to sell herself than for a man to buy a woman? When we have such conditions that thousands of girls work for $3 a week, can we wonder that many of them sell their bodies for the sake of getting more money? Things cannot be different so long as some people live in superfluity and others have nothing; so long as we have competition and private property.

As to our standard of morals, society says that the woman who loves illegally is an outcast. Not only men, but even women condemn her. But "respectable" women have no reason to do so, for, as a rule, they themselves marry men not because they love them, but because they expect to be supported by them. Marriage without love is prostitution, no matter by what name you call it. A married woman promises to love and obey her husband all her life. This only adds lying to vice. An ordinary prostitute does not pretend to love the man she associates with; she is under no obligation to him; but the married woman sells herself for life.

Our false modesty is responsible for vice; we are afraid to instruct our children in the functions of sex. But if it is wrong to discuss the sex question before marriage, it should also be wrong after marriage. The Parkhurst movement of a few years ago and the crusade of today are political tricks, productive of no good results. They wage war not against vice itself, but against open vice; they have no objection to veiled vice. Our politicians are discovering that the people are beginning to lose confidence in them, and so they raise new issues—the purity of the home, the protection of the family.

So long as the law enforces monogamic relations, prostitution will not cease. True morality does not depend upon legal marriage. Nothing is so good as mutual love. If a man and a woman love each other, no one has a right to interfere with them. People who defend our present system of marriage should remember that the law does not recognize rape within the bonds of marriage. Is this morality? If woman is vicious it is largely not her fault, but that of the conditions. The majority of prostitutes come from the ignorant classes, and it is a remarkable fact that they are generally very pious and have images of Christ in their houses. You do not find Liberal women among them. Women who do not believe in heaven and in salvation through the blood of Christ do not sell themselves.

If we want to lessen vice, we must begin with ourselves. If we condemn others, let us also condemn ourselves. Give us an opportunity to develop, and prostitution will become a thing of the past. We need education in every phase of life, and no subject should be too sacred to discuss. Freethought, in its broadest sense, teaches us that what is wrong for a woman is also wrong for a man. Give woman freedom, remove the bars in her way, and there will be no more talk about vice.

Current Notes.

On Sunday last Geo. D. Herron closed a series of lectures in Central Music Hall, this city, that has attracted more attention, perhaps, from thoughtful and philosophic minds, than any similar course ever delivered in Chicago. This course began January 26, and continued each Sunday afternoon till March 17, with a single exception, when the lecturer was detained in New York.

Prof. Herron is called a "Socialist" but his socialism is not of the narrow and technical variety but is broadly liberal, philosophical, tolerant and progressive, and the fact that his most heretical and iconoclastic utterance were received with enthusiastic applause by audiences averaging little less than two thousand persons of the more intelligent classes, is evidence that the seed sown by such pioneers as Albert Parsons, August Spies and their comrades, was not sown in vain.

The Chicago Society of Anthropology continues to draw good audiences notwithstanding the great counter attraction of the Herron lectures at the same hour. Now that these are closed for a while—Prof. Herron being called to deliver a similar course in Boston—it is believed that the meetings of the Society of Anthropology will be still more numerously attended than for some weeks or months past. These meetings are held in a large and well furnished hall on the seventeenth floor of the great Masonic Temple, one of the most wonderful structures of the kind in the world. The outlook over the city and lake, from the windows of this hall, is well worth the ascent (by elevator) to what seems a dizzy height when viewed from the street or sidewalk.

Last Sunday the society was addressed by a genuine, full-blood representative of the North American Indians—a woman—whose opening address I did not hear, but whose closing speech in reply to her critics, would have done credit to most pale-faced lecturers. Though she claimed to have had scarce any education in schools her use of the English language was excellent.

The subject for next Sunday afternoon—beginning at 3:30 sharp—is the "History of the Universe" by Prof.—— of—— University, a subject that should lift the hearer well out of the fogs of sublunary commonplace. On Sunday the 31st of March we are to hear something about mundane affairs again, the subject being, "Marriage, considered in its historical, ethical, sociologic and biologic aspects." The opening address is expected to be made by the writer of these lines. M. H.

I. L. P., Brocton, Mass.:—About a year ago there was in Lucifer a long list of comparisons between free love and bond love. I lent the paper and did not get it back. Please send it to me, either the paper or as a leaflet—as I think was spoken of at the time. I enclose one dime, I can distribute some of the leaflets, "To Mothers," and "Do You Know," of which you kindly sent me samples. You might send me twenty of each now, and later I will send for more. I mean to subscribe for your autobiography, but just now can hardly spare a cent for anything. I can distribute some papers if you will send.

NOW READY. JUST OUT.

DR. FOOTE'S NEW BOOK.

THE HOME CYCLOPEDIA
OF POPULAR MEDICAL, SOCIAL, AND SEXUAL SCIENCE.

Contains a full, plain, and easy reading treatise on "Health and Disease, with Recipes," all the average reader can profitably learn of personal hygiene and common diseases (including special, separate chapters for men and women); all right up to date, and fully illustrated with hundreds of photo-engravings and chromo-lithographs. Contains also the already popular "Plain Home Talk" about the relations of the sexes and social customs in all ages, and all countries, with "original and startling" suggestions for social reforms; newly revised, enlarged, and well illustrated. All is "heart to heart" plain home talk from a clear-thinking, plain-speaking, liberal minded medical author of over forty years experience. Nearly 1 000 000 of his former books sold. A curious book for curious people, and a sensible book for every one. Answers 1,000 delicate questions one would like to ask his regular physician and yet doesn't want to.

1,248 pages, 400 illustrations, (5 in colors), 2°0 recipes. Price Cloth bound, $2, mailed. Address Lucifer Office, 120 Fulton St. Chicago.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents.

What The Young Need to Know: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages, 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs. By Oswald Dawson. Coutains full-page half-tone pictures of Ezra Heywood, Moses Harman, Lillian Harman, and Lois Waisbrooker. Bound in boards, handsomely illuminated covers, 64 pages. 20 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul. "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. By E. C. Walker. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"A WOMAN in order to live the purest life, must be FREE, must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially."—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD," by Henry Olerich. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 4 0 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy Price $1. For sale at this office.

Freethought Ideal, Edited by Etta Semple, is published fort-nightly at Ottawa, Kansas. It is the only atheistic paper in the world edited and published by a woman. Fifty cents per year. Samples free.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

By Grant Allen. "The Old Asceticism said: 'Be Virtuous and You Will Be Happy.' The New Hedonism says: 'Be Happy and You Will Be Virtuous." This is the key note of Grant Allen's Masterpiece. 30 large pages, five cents For sale at this office.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo. 172 pages. Price 25 cents.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution, its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents; for sale at this office.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. B. Foote's time-tried handbook, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., NO. 11. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, MARCH 30, E. M. 301. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE NO. 858

Right Shall Rule.

Short is the triumph of evil,
Long is the reign of right,
The men who win by the aid of sin,
The nation that rules by might,
The party that rules by corruption,
The trickster, the knave, the thief,
May thrive for a time on the fruits of crime,
But their seeming success is brief.

Sneer if you will at honor;
Make virtue a theme for jest;
Reflect on the man who strives as he can
To seek and to do the best:
Make goodness a butt for slander
And often excuse for vice;
Proclaim the old lie, the corruptionist's cry,
That every man has his price.

Yet know that the truth shall triumph,
That evil shall find its doom;
That the cause of right, though subdued by might,
Shall break from the strongest tomb;
That wrong, though it seems to triumph,
Lasts only for a day,
While the cause of truth has eternal youth,
Shall rule o'er the world for aye.

Free Love, Free Maternity.*

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

Here is yet another pertinent question closely related to free love, in which in fact is involved its perfect solution.

Amongst the innocent female babies brought into this cursed world by the chance of a brutal copulation, legal or no, there is at least, only to mention so-called civilized countries, a one-hundredth part destined to become slaves, pariahs the most debased, the most sunken.

Prostitution is everywhere, openly or hypocritically, transformed by its directors into a social institution, destined to safeguard the anti-natural and futile chastity of the daughters of the bourgeois class against the terrible but perfectly natural rutting of the young males.

Our customs make of some girls the tortured victims through the abuse of passions of the proper use of which a great number of others are deprived. Let these latter, forming a great majority, victims also by reason of their disobedience to the physiological law of sexual exercise, revolt against such prejudices, re conquer that which has been so disastrously refused them by the laws and customs; so that saving themselves, they may likewise save at one and the same time their poor martyr sisters and destroy forever, in the only efficacious manner, feminine slavery and prostitution!

In a word, let women remain the sole arbiters of their destiny; let them not wait for anything from laws; let them know how to will; let them act. With the same stroke, they will realise the most important chapter of universal emancipation and will thus at once enjoy these two good things which are the complement of each other; freedom of love, freedom of maternity.

This counsel is given exclusively from the feminine viewpoint. Both in the legal and free unions, it is in effect the woman who runs the greatest risk as much on account of natural phenomena as by the aggravation that law and custom add to them. It has been sufficiently repeated with the support of all possible proof that laws have been made by men in favor of their sex and to the detriment of the other. One could never too much restate that, still worse than laws, customs kept up from prejudice, especially the prejudice of woman, maintain her in slavery.

It is for the women privileged by fortune, or intelligence, or the two together, to take in hand themselves the cause of their sex and not to leave the charge of it to those of the other that so large a number amongst them wrongly accuse of being the unique cause of their troubles. To succeed they must first of all unite frankly with the humble and downcast ones, not by considering themselves their generous protectresses, deigning to forgive them their faults and weaknesses; but, on the contrary, thoroughly penetrated with this truth; that it is for them to be pardoned by their martyr sisters for a social state of which they themselves have gathered all the benefits. In the second place, they must renounce those vain speeches, vows, protestations, rights, addresses to public bodies, and, without waiting that the usurpers, masters of the world by our softness, deign to give them crumb by crumb little successive liberties, they must take without any permission full and entire liberty themselves.

In England, country of practical people, these examples are already frequently and usefully given. The well-known act of Edith Lanchester has better served the cause of feminine emancipation than an infinite number of vain speeches. Her example of independence has been followed, and will yet be more so when the indispensable neo-malthusian note shall be sounded with more vigor.

To round off and complete what has gone before, it is necessary to treat the question of free love from the masculine point of view. This is far easier, if one alone considers the material side of the problem. In our pretended monogamic society, nearly all men practice polygamy, enjoying the advantages of freedom of love without accepting any of its obligations; they are glorified by the same act which brings dishonor and disdain, ending in misery, to their women companions. But there exists a certain number whose conscience will not permit them to base their pleasures on the unhappiness of others, for whom an engagement is all the more binding because of its being less legal; and for these, freedom of the affections has the same importance and should have the same corrective action as for woman.

Married or not, the honest father finds himself absolutely bound to the mother of his children, and for him it is not sufficient to pay merely his portion of the expenses; he reasonably considers himself under obligations to furnish his quota of the care and training. The foregoing admonitions are thus as applicable to him as to his woman companion.

The first attraction lovewards is provoked by exterior charms: beauty, spirit or temper, gaiety. . . . This is amply sufficient to pass current at the bar of public opinion, which makes a pretension of prohibiting the indulgences that nature permits and encourages. This however is reversed when it is a question of treating in common for the education of love's fruits. It will therefore be to the interest of the man, as much as that of the woman, that this love should not become fertile until a common life, intimate and sufficiently long, shall have proved to the one as to the other of the lovers desirous of becoming parents, the perfect conformity of ideas, of tastes, of customs.

There are faults or foibles that chains exaggerate, that true liberty lessens; tensing, egotism, rapacity; feeble woman protected by the legal tie, has yet more than man a tendency to abandon herself to, as if to console herself for the exclusive obligations that the law imposes upon her, tendency that she would not have if, for having accepted the joy of love, she had not had to renounce a very great part of her liberty.

Furthermore our educations are so different that, in an intimate and forced life, our tastes, sentiments, tendencies clash at every instant. All this is perhaps less for coarse people, with but little active brains, than for those of more delicate texture, thinkers. It often happens that a man animated with high scientific and humanitarian preoccupations once passed the period called the honeymoon, finds, under the more or less carefully laid-on polish of a very superficial education, a spouse with vulgar tastes, banal, without ideal, who is a drag upon his acts and thoughts, who lessens and even renders worthless his very life! Here then is a case of anguish quite equivalent to that of the exceptional woman afore commented upon.

The young man who aims at giving to his life a grandiose trend, who would leave his mark upon the work of progress, more than all others ought to have at least as much prudence as a young woman, before transforming a superficial love into an austere parental duty which he might be prevented from performing well, and which would then be for him a never-ceasing source of the most intense suffering.

An English observer has very truly remarked that there are not two marriages in a thousand which realize the dreams of the fiances. Among the remaining 998, a most painful situation exists which varies from unexpressed dissent to frequent bitter-words, to open warfare, to murders. These last exceed, at Paris, according to the rendering of Madame Cheliga-Levy, the number of days upon which they were accomplished and, from one victim of marriage killed at a single stroke how many tens there must be undergoing a lengthy martyrdom; and what of the slow death for which the official statistics would designate an entirely different cause!

The situation of adults is certainly very lamentable; but still worse is that of the children in the inferno of the big legal family. At the mercy of parental tempers, either smoldering or violent, their education is exactly the reverse of that which it should be.

The many varieties of their moral and physical misery have been often enough portrayed by the realist novel writers so I refrain from going into them in detail. It suffices, in summing them up, to say that the child born haphazardly, brought up by worse than incapable parents, will become even more degraded than they themselves!

Have mercy upon him, oh ye blind couples! If you cannot be certain that he will be of use later on and always happy, give to him to his advantage and your own, this incomparable proof of love; don't call him to life.

Deign to repeat the clear-cut verse of Sully-Prudhomme:

O thou son the best beloved
Who never shall be born!

You cannot make your room beautiful by buying an expensive vase and putting it on the mantel-shelf, but if you live an honest life in it, it will grow beautiful in proportion as it comes to answer to the wants of such a life.—Edward Carpenter.

Notes and Comments.

BY C. F. HUNT.

In a single number of the "American Contractor," that of March 10, appear seventeen notices of library buildings to be built by Mr. Andrew Carnegie for as many different towns and cities. If the hundreds of Carnegie libraries contain a fair proportion of reform books, enough to create a public opinion strong enough to abolish the privileges by which Carnegie obtained his wealth, and by which other millionaires are foolishly and unjustly piling up wealth, considerable credit will be due Mr Carnegie, who really may have that end in view, as it is suspected that he is more socialist than philanthropist. Mr. Tom L. Johnson, the noted single taxer, is such a man, openly and candidly opposing the means by which he himself gained his millions. If anything better than conscience moves these men, there is hope for the triumph of progress over greed.

Mr. Franklin H. Wentworth recently occupied Professor Herron's pulpit, in Central Music Hall, Chicago, and the large audience seemed well satisfied with the substitution, as Mr. Wentworth is an able, witty and instructive speaker. However, some of his remarks were puzzling to those who are radical as to theology. He mentioned that Mr. Rockefeller owns the earth, and soon after gave his opinion that God intended that the earth should be possessed by all his children, but failed to draw a comparison between the strength and executive ability of God and that of Mr. Rockefeller.

If the word democracy has a definite meaning, it must include the principle of local option. The "Chicago American" claims to be democratic, but demands an amendment of the federal constitution forbidding polygamy in Utah, saying that the state came into the Union under a pledge to abolish that institution. This amendment is for Utah alone, and would be, so the "American" says, "An unwarranted interference with the domestic institutions of its (the administration's) proteges in the Sulus." A reason for this discrimination against the rights of Utah is not given.

An interesting letter in the "Chicago Record," signed "A Republican" shows that the last popular vote for president does not really endorse the policy of President McKinley. The analysis shows a large Bryan loss in the South due to apathy of those voters who knew the result was certain without their votes, and furthermore shows an actual gain for Bryan in the north. I quote:

"Mr. Bryan, therefore, made a net gain over Mr. McKinley in the northern states of 10,461. This does not look like an approval of the course of the republican party in these states, which are supposed to represent more fully the true and controlling sentiment of the nation, but, on the contrary, it indicates just the reverse.

"Mr. Bryan gained in the east 239,599 and lost 29,362 in the west. Still further confirmation."

On St. Patrick's day two Irish factions indulged in a fight. Who ever heard of a fight between factions of agnostics or of atheists?

* * *

Judge Duane says there is no law authorizing the Board of Education to enforce vaccination of pupils, but that it may do so in an "emergency," that is, if some Judge, or perhaps the Board itself, decides that an emergency exists, then the Board may act without authority of law. This is like giving a body of men the power to declare martial law at will.

"Economic Principles," a pamphlet by Eliza Stowe Twitchell, is in the main an able and entertaining exposition of the political economy of Henry George. One paragraph, however, proves how a good logician may nod. After defining "capital" as "wealth used to produce more wealth," Mrs. Twitchell says: "A sewing machine used to make garments for sale is capital; used to make garments for the family, it is wealth, for the machine thus used is being consumed (worn out) to satisfy needs or desires." Yet in either case the machine is used to produce more wealth, to satisfy needs, and is worn out. The woman operating the machine is sometimes "worn out." How should she be classed? Henry George's theories do not need this sort of analysis. Because a woman sewing for her family does not receive a fixed stipend, is no reason for classifying her machine differently from a machine used in a factory.

Mrs. Twitchell dispenses the usual twaddle about land being a "heritage" intended by God the Father for the use of all his children. If it be a heritage, then the father is dead; and the children are quarreling over the estate.

"Koresh" condemns Lucifer's work as "unscientific" as compared to his own. His theories have been shown to be absurd, impossible and he has failed to reply. Is it because he knows he cannot? A false theory may fit another false theory, but his theories do not fit each other, yet he continues uttering them. Is it because there is money for him in so doing?

Crusading in Manhattan.

BY JAMBLICHUS.

Under the pretense of suppressing vice, Anthony Comstock has been rubbing his perverted ideas of human life under the noses of the people, to their nausea, for the last twenty-five years. Partly as a result of the unsuppressed continuance of his pestilential work moral conditions in certain sections of New York have become so vile that the whole city is aroused to protest.

The protest took the form of a public meeting at Carnegie Hall, on Sunday afternoon, March 18, organized by over one hundred influential women.

Were these women as wise to understand the causes of evil as they are earnest to combat it, much good might be expected to result from their meeting, still some strong truths spoken in a way to impress the most bigoted were mixed with the common-place nonsense usually heard on such occasions.

The meeting opened with a reading of the decalogue by Rev. Phoebe Hanaford. I never heard the "Thou shalt nots" recited with so much vindictive vigor and with so little adherence to the text.

The president, Mrs. Boole, followed in a long address beginning:

"A moral emergency confronts the City of New York, due to the protection of vice, and to official complicity with forces of evil. While it has been hinted at in the past, the best classes of women have been ignorant of the conditions. The veiling of the facts through false modesty, coupled with wilful negligence and ignorance, has contributed to the growth of the evils. They have been increasing, and have reached enormous proportions.

"The best public sentiment of the city would scorn to license houses of prostitution, gambling places, and policy shops, but the officials by a system of bribery and fining at regular intervals have protected vice without even a show of attempting to lessen the crime, and this has served to enrich the very men whose duty it was to enforce the law, while the city's revenues have been increased at the expense of its morality."

The wail of this address was that whatever is law must be enforced at all events. (Ignoring the real fact that such a war cry is just what the blackmailers want to increase the terrors with which they menace their victims). Then came a lament that men were not bounded for their immoralities the same as women are. Then a groan about the side doors of saloons which the speaker seemed not to understand are the outcome of the prohibition craze just as more blackmail will inevitably result from the crusade she leads. And then that tiresome Comstockian whine about the protection of youth, ended her discourse.

Another long harangue about "Dangers to Children in New York" exhausted the time as well as the patience of the audience and abridged the time for the really worthy speakers who had useful suggestions to present.

Dear old Heber Newton followed. A brave man and a manly man among theologians. But the best remarks were by John S. Crosby who made a strong plea for freedom, pointing out the fact that the saloon is as potent in politics as the church and stating the principle that the sole business of government is to save one from the interference of the other.

It is a fact that conditions in New York are very serious. That a fanatical crusade will lessen the seriousness of those conditions there seems little reason to hope. The terror of the law has always enabled those in authority to extort blackmail from those against whom legislation inveighs, and it always will be so.

The only real remedy is to cripple the power to extort blackmail. When that is done the incentive to perpetuate vice in order that its yield of blackmail may be fruitful will be gone.

"Infidel Women."

BY E. A. MAGOON.

In Lucifer's last issue, I notice the suggestion is made for a discussion of the above subject, by its readers, which suggestion indicates dissent from the opinions expressed by Ella Wheeler Wilcox. While in the beginning of her article Mrs. Wilcox did not define her meaning of the word infidel, it is clearly evident, as she proceeds, that her definition is not such as is given by those who consider themselves the peculiar favorites of heavenly privileges.

To be devoid of a religious belief, she assumes, is to lack the unfoldment of the spiritual nature, the divine love element, that gives to herself an inspiring spirituality, that strengthens her and enables her to conscientiously and bravely meet the many obligations and responsibilities of life.

I can fully endorse her utter reliance on the efficacy of prayer to meet the demands that come at times, to all. Most truthfully does she say: "The woman who does not know the wonderful healing and helping influence of prayer has not yet entered the ante-room of joy."

It is the law that receiving can only come by the asking. Love is life; it is love alone that sustains the heart or affectional nature, and it is as necessary to healthfulness as food for the stomach; for happiness is the best promoter of health of body and of mind.

I never was able to conceive of any real enjoyment, in this life, disconnected from any thought beyond it. Those who look for disappointment are sure to meet with it. A few for awhile enjoy congenial companionship in the family relation, but when aspirations rise no higher than physical and material gratification the end is bitter disappointment and remorse.

As you, Bro. Harman, were once, like myself, a Methodist, you may with me appreciate a few closing lines of an "Ode to Devotion" published in a Methodist magazine in the year 1820, hence I reproduce it:

Devotion! 'Tis thine to elevate the mind
Above this earth, to joys of purest kind;
Expanding all its faculties, to rise
And gaze at the infinite, beyond the skies.
Thou dost unlock the secret door of heaven
By ardent prayer, the key, to mortals given
And usher in that bright refulgent ray,
That brighter shines unto the perfect day.

Nothing can be more abject and miserable than the usual conception of God. Imagine to yourself what pleasure it would be to him to burn us or to torture us. Can we believe any human being capable of creating us for such a purpose? Would it show his power? Why, he is omnipotent! Would it show his justice? We credit God with attributes which are utterly hateful to the meanest of men.—General Gordon.

Meetings.

Chicago readers of Lucifer are hereby specially requested to be in attendance at the next meeting of the Society of Anthropology, Sunday March 31, and take part, as far as possible, in the discussion of an institution believed to be productive of more happiness—or misery—more of human progress or retrogression—than any other, namely, the marriage institution. Some unusual, if not original features, it is expected, will be introduced into the discussion. Unsolicited and unsuggested by himself, the writer of this notice has been selected by the management, to make the opening and closing address.

To find the place of meeting, take one of the numerous elevators in the great Masonic Temple, ascend to the seventeenth floor, turn to the left and keep going till you reach the large hall, from which a fine view is to be had of the inland sea called Lake Michigan. Time of opening the lecture 3-30 P. M., sharp. Seats, as usual, free. Don't forget the time and place.

A Word to Our Workers—Old and New.

In response to oft-repeated inquiries from friends—also to challenges that seem not specially friendly, such as that of N. E. Arnold printed last week, we began in No. 857 a series of articles intended to define and illustrate, at some length and precision, the aim, the purpose of the publication known as Lucifer. The better to do this some account of its origin and history will be given.

Believing, as some of us do, that Lucifer's line of work is fundamental in the field of reform—that its work is second to none other in importance to human happiness, human progress and welfare, it has been thought that the publication of this series of articles would be a very suitable and timely occasion for making a special effort to put the claims of our work before thinking people everywhere.

In the belief and hope that many if not all of our subscribers and helpers would take a like view of the matter, an extra large edition of No. 857 was struck off—just DOUBLE our usual issue. Whether the printing of this unusual number of copies shall prove to be wise or otherwise will very largely depend upon the help we get from our present roll of subscribers. Within the past few months and in response to special offers, quite a considerable addition has been made to our subscription list, mainly of short term subscribers. If only one half, or one tenth even, of our present subscribers do as well as a few have done—as canvassers for new subscribers, there will be no difficulty in placing the extra copies of last week's issue as the first number sent to new subscribers.

Our standing offer for trial trips with Lucifer is ten weeks for ten cents, or one cent per copy. Fewer than ten numbers are scarcely enough to enable new readers to determine whether they wish the paper continued to their address or not.

Addressing now each reader in particular: How many names of trial or yearly subscribers will YOU be responsible for, within the ensuing month of April? It is important that we know, approximately, how many copies to print of each of the issues that are to contain the series of articles on the purpose and history of our work—supposing that new subscribers will want to see them all. At first it was intended to insert another installment of the series aforesaid in this current issue, and print an extra large number of copies in anticipation of a largely increased demand—but on reflection it has been decided to wait one week to see what the response will be to these suggestions.

SAMPLE COPIES.

Within the six months last past we have sent out many thousands of sample copies of Lucifer; hitherto the harvest, in the way of increased business from this lavish sowing of seed has not been equal to expectations, due, in great measure, as we think, to the fact already mentioned, that our purpose has not been sufficiently made plain, in the one or two numbers sent to each name. This very reasonable demand—definite information in regard to the nature of the changes sought to be made in our present social or sexual customs and institutions, and in our economic, financial and governmental institutions—we are now trying to supply. Will YOU help us to reach those who, if proper information be laid before them, would probably become efficient co-operators in what many of us think the greatest work, the greatest reform or revolution, ever inaugurated in the memory of man? Comment—Various.

FREEDOM IN LOVE AND MATERNITY.

It is hoped no reader will fail to read the article found on first pages of this and last week's Lucifer, entitled "Free Love—Free Maternity," translated for us from the French of Paul Robin, by a scholarly English friend now sojourning at Nice in France. Barring a few idiomatic forms of expression no better statement of the general principles for which Lucifer stands sponsor has ever been penned. As this week's paper will doubtless be read by many who have not seen the first half of the essay, I here reproduce a paragraph or two therefrom:

"Freedom of maternity is the indispensable condition of freedom in love. It should have no other guides than physiological science and sexual prudence. If, after a more or less number of experiences she [the young woman] finds a companion with whom, in perfect conformity of culture and tastes, she thinks she might pass a long and happy life, let her associate, if it so please her, altogether with him; without bothering about the vain legal sanctions; and let her have the incomparable happiness of having children that she will be sure of being able to well provide for; and that these children bear her name alone."

"If by misfortune, the lovers are mistaken in each other, if the harmony does not last, if there be incompatibility of temper, if they separate, the love will not be succeeded, as now-a-days, by hatred and horror, but rather by friendship, or, at least esteem. And the honest man will not fail to contribute his proper share towards the material well-being of the fruits of his former loves."

This is simply saying that love, joined to wisdom drawn from experience, and coupled with responsibility to self and child, constitutes the only standard or rule of sex-morality that should be exacted of woman—who is the real burden-bearer in the work of reproducing the race.

This essay on "Freedom in Love and Maternity" should be printed in leaflet form and circulated by the million, and it would be, if Lucifer were the possessor of Aladdin's lamp.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Some adverse criticism has reached this office in regard to the character of certain advertisements that have appeared from time to time, in Lucifer's columns. In reply will say that it is scarcely possible to distinguish, always, the fraudulent from the genuine, in the matter of advertisements. Take for instance, the advertisers of books and lessons on "how to induce the hypnotic sleep and thereby cure all known diseases and bad habits." If we should condemn as frauds all the teachers of and believers in "auto-suggestion," "mental healing," etc., etc., we must condemn many thousands if not millions of our fellow citizens who are, in other matters, considered intelligent and honest.

That there is truth in the theory of mental healing has been demonstrated in too many instances to admit of rational doubt. The most sensible course, then, would seem to be to let each reader judge for herself and himself, whether the claims of an advertiser are worthy of credence or not. If the advertiser promises what seems impossible, absurd, ridiculous, no one is obliged to bite at the alluring bait. One of my friends sent twenty dollars for a course of lessons in mental healing. After faithful and persistent effort to understand these lessons he threw them aside as worthless to him. Yet he made no complaint of fraud; was willing to admit that the fault may have been with himself. Another friend paid twenty dollars to the same healer and got no benefit but steadily grew worse till she died. This result, as we all know, proves nothing as against the theory of mental healing, since people die under all kinds of treatment and under no treatment at all.

"Prove all things and hold fast [only] to that which is good", is a maxim of universal application.

EDITORIAL COURTESY.

Lucifer's editor, its workers and readers, know by experience what adverse criticism means. Consequently when words of sincere commendation come our way they are all the more keenly appreciated. This platitudinous remark is suggested by a paragraph in the New York "Truth Seeker," of March 23, penned in reference to the lecture of Emma Goldman, before the Manhattan Liberal Club, New York, a report of which lecture was printed in last week's Lucifer.

It appears from the correspondence published on the last page of the "Truth Seeker" dated as above, that the report of Miss Goldman's lecture had reached the "galley stage" in the "Truth Seeker" office, and was then "killed" by the editor. When called to account by the Secretary of the Manhattan Liberal Club, for such slaughter, the editor defended himself by saying that "Miss Goldman devoted a portion of her lecture to an apology for what are generally spoken of as crimes against nature, as she had a right to do," but that he "saw no way of reproducing her remarks. . . . without giving offence," and wound up his defense in these words:

"We may say that we sustained a perusal of the report without demoralization: how it might have affected the unilluminated is another matter, and hence we applauded the determination of the reporter to try it on the readers of Lucifer, who are tough."

A Kansas reader and faithful helper of Lucifer, when calling my attention to this editorial in the "Truth Seeker" says, "the blatant arrogant calls us all tough!"—evidently considering herself abused and slandered. Surely she did not read the paragraph carefully; for, observe that Mr. Macdonald tells us he himself passed unscathed the terrible ordeal of reading Emma Goldman's lecture, but he feared for the "unilluminated;" thereby plainly implying that all who like himself are illuminated could safely read the said report. Logically, then, the word "tough" as used by him means simply illuminated! Can we imagine a more finely turned compliment?

Turning to the dictionary we find that "tough" means, "Not easily broken; able to endure hardships; firm; strong."

Wonder how the readers of the "Truth Seeker" relish the left-handed compliment paid them by their editor? According to his own explanation, and according to the definition given by Webster, the readers of the "Truth Seeker" are regarded by its editor as "unilluminated;" that they are easily broken; not able to endure hardship; not firm nor strong.

And now—to close this somewhat personal reference—is it not true that we are, all of us, prone to be over-anxious about our neighbor's moral status? Are we not all too ready to assume that while we ourselves are strong, able to take care of ourselves, our neighbors need a guardian?

Is not this the animating principle, the central thought, of the "Society for the Prevention of Vice"? the society that in the name of purity commits untold crimes, and that fosters the very evils its machinery is organized to suppress?

Would it not be better, infinitely better, to let the facts of life, the facts of nature, be known? even the facts of perverted and abnormal nature, instead of covering up these ugly facts and pretending they do not exist? "Forewarned is fore-armed."

In this connection read the article of "Jamblichus" in this issue, entitled "Crusading in Manhattan." M. H.

Home Cyclopedia of Medical, Sexual and Social Science.

This work is from the popular author of "Medical Common Sense," "Plain Home Talk," etc. It is, indeed, made up from earlier works, with about 500 pages of new and original matter, and is written in language which makes it valuable for family reference. Besides its valuable advice in regard to the prevention of disease—its hygienic feature—it contains about 250 recipes for the treatment of various ills. It is subdivided into four parts. Part I. Treats of Disease, its Causes, Prevention, and Cure. Part II. of Chronic Diseases, their Causes and Successful Treatment. In this part is found the valuable recipes. Part III. is Plain Home Talk about the natural relations of the sexes, civilization and marriage, and is replete with valuable information on subjects which are especially valuable to the married or those contemplating marriage. Part IV contains suggestions for the improvement of popular marriage, and one of the most remarkable chapters in this part is entitled Restricted Marriage and Parentage, in which is given an ingenious plan for regulating both marriage and parentage in a way to avoid the reproduction of non-viable and unbalanced children. It is worth the price of the entire volume. Marriage reformers and reformers in all the various domains of human improvement will be interested in this. Dr. Foote's style is easy, and free from the technicalities usual in medical literature. Hence his works have always met with a large sale. Twenty thousand of this edition have been printed, showing the confidence the publishers have in the sale of this work. This revised and enlarged book will doubtless be greatly appreciated by the public.

Take the Devil from the drama of Christianity and the plot is gone; there is no connection between the scenes, none between the acts; the whole drama becomes unmeaning fragments, chips, pieces, splinters. As a matter of fact, the New Testament is more explicit than the Old. The Jews, believing that Jehovah was God, had very little business for a Devil. There was nothing too mean for Jehovah to do himself.—Ingersoll.

"Dawn-Thought on the Reconciliation."

REVIEWED BY A. CHAVANNES.

I have lately been reading "Dawn Thought," a new book by J. W. Lloyd, an author well and favorably known to the readers of Lucifer, and I feel like expressing my views as to the value of the book as a factor in the cause of progress.

To me, the chief value of the book lies in the fact that it is one of the many indications of the trend of present thought, for its whole aim is to help the reconciliation of individualists to a belief in the existence of one superior, all-containing intelligence, which controls and includes all that which exists in the Universe, and its value to the cause of progress will depend upon its success in achieving that reconciliation.

The trend of thought has much changed upon that question, in the last fifty years. Up to that time, as a logical result of the belief in creation, the world was looked upon as a battle field between two contending forces—God and the Devil, representing good and evil. The theory of evolution, while it destroyed the basis for that belief, did not furnish a substitute for it, in so much that it did not teach any positive doctrine as to the control of the universe. The ruling idea which is accepted by the materialists—who first promulgated the evolution theory—is that man is the highest known intelligence, and that all present progress is controlled by him.

This changed completely the views accepted by reformers as to the control of progress. The reformers of old had used their energies in proving that the changes they were driving for, were according to the will of God as taught in his revelation, but the new reformers, who are usually believers in evolution, base their arguments upon their supposed superior knowledge, claiming more intelligence than their fellow men, and striving for the general acceptance of their views, to the exclusion of those which are advocated by other men.

But here and there, some reformers are looking out of that belief, and in this book Lloyd takes rank among those who believe that progress is many-sided, and that all known forces are working for its advancement, under the control of a higher intelligence.

As Lloyd is by nature a poet, his book is written in a poetic style, which will appeal to many persons who would neither read nor appreciate the same views it expressed in a more prosaic style. And in this poetic style, which is much praised by many reformers, and in the important truths it contains, is found the true value of the book, which comes at a time when much attention is given to the solution of the problems therein discussed.

For there is no doubt that the trend of present thought is away from the conclusions of the materialists, and in the direction of a belief in the oneness of all progress. Reformers of all classes are getting tired of contending against each other, and are getting ready to accept a belief that teaches that all of them are co-workers in the same field, each cultivating that part of it which appeals the most to his temperament, and where he thinks he can do the best work.

And from that standpoint, the next logical advance is to acknowledge that those who differ the most completely from us, and even those who oppose our efforts, are also co-workers in the same field, and to excuse their opposition as due to ignorance, remembering that in time past, we ourselves also opposed other reformers, whom we now can see were really working for the progress of humanity.

Before we can then recognize that all efforts are thus co-operating for the progress of the world, we must outgrow the belief implanted into the human race, that there is only one road to progress, which happens to be the one we have adopted, and broaden our views so as to see that all human efforts what soever, make for the advancement of humanity.

"Dawn Thought" will do its share in thus broadening the vision of reformers, for it teaches with no uncertain voice the oneness of all forces at work in the Universe, and no one who accepts this oneness, can look any longer upon this world as being divided by influences, some making for good, and others making for evil. There are, it is true, progressive and conservative forces, but both are needed for the best evolution of society.

There are, among the supporters of Lucifer, many old war-horses, who have fought a good fight in the times when the belief in the control of man over progress was absolute, and when no one could see any good in those by whom they were opposed, and these persons will not easily accept the new philosophy, but there are also among them, many who are imbued with the new spirit, and who, while they believe that Lucifer is doing a much needed work in a part of the field almost entirely neglected, yet recognize that even those by whom they are opposed, have got a work to do for which they are best qualified.

It is to those persons, who are willing to believe that progress is not a one-sided process, promoted by some, and opposed by others, but a well-defined advance, towards which all social forces are made to contribute, under the direction of an all-pervading mind, that I would recommend the reading of "Dawn Thought," for it will certainly help them in the process of reconciliation, and leave them in a much happier frame of mind, while it will certainly in no way diminish their zeal for the accomplishment of such reform work for which they are the best qualified.

VARIOUS VOICES.

William Halligan, Ephrata, Pa.:—I see by the No. on the wrapper of the Light-Bearer that I am running on time, and as I want the kindly visits of the Light that shines on every page. I send you a dollar before the light goes out and leaves me in darkness.

I. E. L. H., Toronto, Ont.:—Perhaps you will remember that sometime ago, I wrote, saying that I wanted to see more of your form of "New-Thought" and enclosed twenty-five cents for trial subscription. In looking over Lucifer I am sometimes filled with rejoicing that there is at least one paper on earth both bold and brave enough to voice such sentiments. Again I am forced to think and wonder; still again I am positively disgusted—whether because of my early education, or because the ideas are really "bad," I will not now try to tell. I will read the paper awhile longer and maybe find out. I enclose $1.10 for pamphlets. Don't forget to include "New Hedonism."

[It is doubtless very true that many readers are repelled, if not disgusted, by the reading of one or two copies of Lucifer, who would become earnest and efficient helpers if they would send for and read a few more copies of the paper, or for a few of our pamphlets. M. H.]

D. W. Gilmore, Chanute, Kan.:—My subscription to Lucifer the Light-Bearer has about expired and I enclose money order for two dollars—one to apply on subscription to Lucifer and one for a copy of your book when it is issued. I trust your health and strength will be equal to the task, and that a sufficient amount of the coin of the Empire will be forth-coming to pay all expenses and leave you a handsome profit.

I am very much of a pessimist in regard to the bettering of conditions for the human family. When I read of murders, lynchings, and wars carried on for revenge or for money, and see how men scheme to get the advantage of their fellow men; and how legislators pass laws to favor the few at the expense of the many; and the executors of law will send the petty thief to prison for a long term while the thief who steals millions of dollars not only goes free, but is considered a good man and true, a man to be honored,—when I see all this I am led to ask if there is any good in the human race.

But, on the other hand, when I read of those who are giving their means, time and strength fighting for liberty and better conditions a glimmering ray of hope appears above my mental horizon, and I have a little reason to hope the time may come when everyone will be dealt with justly. It is this slight hope that causes me to add my mite to the power that keeps our Light-Bearer from going down.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 32 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents.

What The Young Need to Know: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lilian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 64 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul, "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth. $1.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. By E. C. Walker. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"A WOMAN in order to live the purest life, must be FREE, must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially."—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD," by Henry Olerich. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 400 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy Price $1. For sale at this office.

Freethought Ideal, Edited by Etta Semple, is published fort-nightly at Ottawa, Kansas. It is the only atheistic paper in the world edited and published by a woman. Fifty cents per year. Samples free.

DO YOU EVER THINK

Of the fate of the Prodigal Daughter? The Prodigal Son forgiven and received with rejoicing—why should different treatment be accorded to his sister? For a vivid, true picture of the conditions in homes and factories which produce thousands of so-called fallen women every year, read "The Prodigal Daughter; or, The Price of Virtue," by Rachel Campbell. THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gliders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

By Grant Allen. "The Old Asceticism said: 'Be Virtuous and You Will Be Happy.' The New Hedonism says: 'Be Happy and You Will Be Virtuous.'" This is the key note of Grant Allen's Masterpiece. 30 large pages, five cents For sale at this office.

Endymion.

The rising moon has hid the stars,
Her level rays, like golden bars,
Lie on the landscape green,
With shadows brown between.

And silver white the river gleams,
As if Diana, in her dreams,
Had dropt her silver bow
Upon the meadows low.

On such a tranquil night as this,
She woke Endymion with a kiss,
When, sleeping in the grove,
He dreamed not of her love.

Like Dian's kiss, unasked, unsought,
Love gives itself, but is not bought;
Nor voice, nor sound betrays
Its deep, impassioned gaze.

It comes,—the beautiful, the free,
The crown of all humanity,—
In silence and alone
To seek the elected one.

Nature and the Law.

BY MAY HUNTLEY.

Once there was a boy who was raised in a forest. His father had fled from the haunts of men in his childhood, because of the falseness of friends and the artificiality of society. His mother was dead, and he had known only the birds, the rabbits, their dogs, sheep and cattle, and one or two friendly old Indians. But when the father felt that death was near he called his son to his side and told him he must go back to civilization which was now much nearer than when he had first retreated to the sheltering shades of their dear woods. He gave him some glittering gold pieces which he said would procure what food and shelter and clothes he needed, when he was living where he could not follow the deer, and other wild animals of the forest, and his own little hut of trees and bushes was beyond his reach. Then the father breathed his last with a yearning glance towards the setting sun. The youth sat by his side for two days and an Indian came and helped to make him a grave and lay him away. Then he wrapt his furs about him and took up his gun and went away through the forest toward the east.

The free-born youth who knew not what a man-made law was like, found himself sadly bewildered when he came to a city. The streets, sidewalks, cars, teams of all kinds, the crowds of strange-looking people, were to him like the fantastic figures of a dream. He thought he could not be awake. Some boys, ever ubiquitous, gathered around him to ridicule; a policeman stopped to look at him and ponder if there were any ordinance forbidding a person to appear on the street in such a garb and such an innocent demeanor. It might have fared hardly with the child of the woods, but a philosopher and philanthropist passed by at the moment. He noticed the handsome boy with the look of an angel in his eyes and the bearing of a god in his erectly carried, vigorous frame. He marked the rich fur wrapped around him, the majestic eagle feathers on his head, and the golden chain about his neck, and knew he was no common "hobo." He approached the boy with a kindly smile which was apparently understood.

"Do you speak English?"

"I know what you say, if that is English. Yes, I remember my father told me that what we speak is English."

"Will you come home with me?"

"Yes."

"What shall I call you?"

"Fern—Fern Vale."

"You may call me, Philip—Heywood, say Philip. Come with me."

Young Vale was taken to a beautiful and artistic mansion and treated as a traveler from another world might have been. He told his simple story to his benefactor, and as his father had told him gold must be paid in the land of civilization for food and shelter he gave his bag of shining pieces to his host. The gentleman was surprised but took them in charge knowing that one so untaught would soon be robbed of them. Unknowingly to himself perhaps, his respect for his new "find" increased.

Philip whispered to a few of his special friends of his discovery. Curiosity and speculation as to his story, his nature and the psychological results of his peculiar youthful environment were intense among them. But Philip did not propose to gratify them immediately; a little preparation was necessary; besides they would be all the more interested for waiting. Meanwhile he tried to keep his "rare specimen" in close seclusion. But this true child of nature knew no such thing as restraint. With the first ray of dawn he was out, in his tight-fitting undergarments of dried deer-skin, slipping down the water pipes as he had slid down the tall, slim trees of his native woods, and away out swiftly over the streets toward where it looked open and free, and there he found a great body of water, a lake. There he drank in the air like nectar of the gods, waved his strong young arms out over the waves, as though he would have embraced the whole sparkling mass; he turned his face to the rising sun, shook his long hair and reveled in the light, the fresh air, the beauty of the boundless water. He was happy as he had not been since his father lived.

A man in a blue coat adorned with bright buttons came up.

"Here, you!" he cried, "Wat yer doin' out here in yer underclothes? Get home now, mighty quick or I'll have to run ye in."

The boy only stared at him. The blue-coated man stared back until the game grew tiresome. "Well, I guess I'll have to take ye along. Don't ye know yer breaking the law?" The officer laid a hand on his shoulder with an impelling force; the young man drew back his sinewy, splendid arm and a great blow fell on the face of the astonished guardian of the law. Then he ran. Never before had city-bred people seen such running. It was the passage of a god, a swift radiance of force, a perfect form in perfect motion. Other policemen tried to stop the runner but they might as well have stopped a rush of wind or a stream of light. He fled from them all and finally found himself in a quiet street of simple dwellings. A solitary horse and wagon moved slowly up the street; a boy sat huddled upon the seat. Fern came up and saw that the youngster was crying. Questioning him he found that he was sick with a fever and could not cry his vegetables for sale and dared not go home with his load. So the older boy, realizing by this time that his dress was different from that of city people, donned a great coat lying in the seat and took up some of the baskets and boxes in the wagon, and carried them to the houses. The people who came to the door gazed astonished at the beautiful face of the singular looking huckster, and impelled some way by his musical voice with its note of appeal lying under the vigorous chord of strength, bought what he had and gave him what it was worth; he did not know, but trusted them entirely. He kept on from house to house, going back to the wagon when he had sold out an armful and starting again. Another blue coated man turned into the street as he was entering a gateway, and he was stopped.

"Have you got a license to peddle?" asked the officer.

"No, whatever that may be;" he answered moving on.

"Then I must arrest you, for you know it is against the law."

"I haven't time to be arrested now. Let me go on. When I am through I'll see what it is you want of me." He went on, sold his armful and came back to the wagon and gave the money to the boy. There were still some things left, but the blue-coat came up and told Fern that he must come with him. When he removed the old great coat and stood before the officer in his tight dress showing his magnificent form, that functionary was dazed and scarcely knew what to do. Finally, after some questions, he decided to take him back to the house which belonged as he knew by the description to one of the richest and most celebrated men in town. Fern willingly went with him and when it was explained that he could scarcely step out of doors alone in the city without breaking some law, he concluded to remain under his first friend's care for the time being.

[TO BE CONCLUDED.]

Vivisection Defended.

BY C. L. JAMES.

A. B. Clarkson reduces to an epigram the last phase of the Movement in Favor of Ignorance which it has been my honor and privilege to expose,—as follows:

"I hold that Doctordom is second only to parsondom and priestcraft as a monopolistic tyranny." [Lucifer March 16.]

So, I am aware, do many theological unbelievers. But that's where the ignorance comes in. That's how the Movement in Favor of Ignorance gets them. That's why I have considered it especially worth while to write against this phase of the Movement in Favor of Ignorance. If they knew anything about "Doctordom" they wouldn't think so. They know nothing about it, except that ecclesiastically founded universities class it with Law and Divinity, as one of the "three learned professions"—and they misunderstand that fact.

The common sense of mankind has always appreciated "Doctordom" so highly that when the church controlled education she was compelled to class it with Law and Divinity—which was, perhaps unintentionally, doing it all the harm she could, as utterances like Mr. Clarkson's show. She always hated its materialistic standpoint and inductive method. She always, as far as she could, put prayers in its place—just like its present enemies. She prohibited, as long as she had power, both vivisection and dissection of the dead (see White's Conflict of Science with Theology)—just as promoters of the Movement in Favor of Ignorance want to do now. That feeling for animals had nothing to do with the prohibition of vivisection then, is as plain as that is not the motive underlying the Movement in Favor of Ignorance now. For while the church prohibited vivisection, she patronized cock-fighting, bull-fighting, burning cats in wicker frames, and burning witches, as amusements well suited to the ignorant—which they certainly are.

The church objected to vivisection, then, as she does now, not because it gives pain to obsolete dogs and cats, but because it gives relief to human beings capable of further usefulness. Her very qualified and gingerly endorsement of "Doctordom" thus mutilated, has been, I have shown, or rather Clarkson has, a great misfortune to "Doctordom." But if he thinks "Doctordom" to blame for it, he should read how mediæval doctors resisted—how they went, in fear of their lives, by night, to steal those bodies the humane church had hung up to feed crows, that by dissection (only possible in secret) they might learn to treat living sufferers—how they were burnt for sorcery like Bolingbroke or heresy like Servetus,—how very unwillingly they accepted any favor from her—how generally doctors are against her and she against them.

As to the charges Mr. Clarkson makes against doctors (omitting the idiotic one of cruelty) I have this to say,—Dogmatism, pedantry, and pretension are very unlovely in doctors, or any one else. But they are the faults not of "Doctordom"—only of human nature. The spirit of "Doctordom" is entirely opposed to them, as Mr. Clarkson would know if he knew anything about "Doctordom."

The intimation that doctors are actuated by jealousy of Christian Scientists, Natural Bone Setters, Seventh Sons of Seventh Sons, Astrologers, Osteopaths, Vitapaths, cure-all-pill-men, hygienic plagiarists, hoc genus omne, is absurd. The boot is all on the other foot. It is the quacks who envy the doctors, and have taken up anti-vivisection as a means of getting some practice away from them. The Christian Scientists, hygienic plagiarists, etc., etc., who "cure the worst possible cases"—faugh!—are strictly limited in their practice and success to people who have nothing the matter with them. Those who have, want vivisectors, not charlatans. "Hence these tears!" The reason doctors so commonly desire laws against quacks is not that they envy the quacks, but that the quacks kill people. The remedy, I grant, is unwise. But only an Anarchist can be expected to see that. And most doctors are not Anarchists, simply because most men are not.

Except perhaps the fine arts, there is no profession which tends towards infidelity and towards Anarchism, especially in the great realm of sex, as much as does the medical. Surely, even Clarkson must know that.

I have said his classing of "Doctordom" and parsondom together is the fundamental error underlying that important phase of the Movement in Favor of Ignorance which he has made himself represent. Dogmatism, pedantry, and pretension, the grand strongholds of ignorance, are of the essence of Law and Divinity. They can only be incidental in Medicine. For Divinity springs from the Volition to Know, and Law from the Volition to Persuade. Medicine springs from the Volition to Do. Law and Divinity are a priori systems, founded on dogmatism, pedantry, and pretension. Medicine is a practical art, into which no man can carry dogmatism, pedantry, or pretension without injury to his own practise and pocket, as proved by the glaring facts that quacks get only those patients who have nothing the matter with them, and that those who are sick immediately forget their objections to vivisection.

If Mr. Clarkson ever breaks a leg, he will promptly forget his. No one "who never saw the inside of a vivisection hell" is "in it" when there are broken bones to mend.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

Infidel Women—My Opinion.

BY A. H. TUCKER.

Long a reader and admirer of Ella Wheeler Wilcox's writings and with some slight glimpses of her not in print, it is easily apparent to me that she was "writing for money" when she wrote of the "infidel woman."

The personality who could conceive the sentiment expressed in the line:—"and drop with you down to sweet hell"—is not one to impress us with its fidelity to orthodox religion.

Our admired little friend must have been in a great "hurry" too, when she associated a lack of faith with infidelity. Such an association is only justifiable in connection with the "petty, spiteful, little thing many of the churches worship as God," in which Ella seems to have no more "faith" than an infidel. The fact is the infidel man or woman has more faith than "any body." Faith in themselves and faith in the supreme controlling forces of the Universe.

No one of experience can read Mrs. W's works without being convinced of her thorough knowledge of men and a very creditable understanding of women; but if we are to take her statement seriously it is very clear she has never cultivated the acquaintance of infidel women sufficiently to know their leading attributes.

I wonder if she has found infidel men lacking in "warmth and sympathy."

If Mrs. W. only knew it there are as many "warm and sympathetic" infidel women as the most ardent supplicant for "love and understanding"—"the higher form of sympathy"—could wish.

On the whole I am constrained to believe that most of our infidel women see through about the same kind of orthodox glasses that our Ella does. Infidels of either sex recognize the inexorable, the all mighty developing and controlling forces of nature. Ella may define it as "The All Soul of Love" if she chooses. We'll not quarrel with her about it.

The need of prayer she mentions is much like the tobacconist's need for the "weed." If he had not formed the habit he would never have felt the need of tobacco.

The inference that the infidel woman is less companionable, less womanly, less motherly than her orthodox sister is entirely unwarranted.

Springfield, Missouri.

That "Infidel" Wife and Step-Mother.

BY S. R. SHEPHERD.

Assuming that both the widower and Mrs. Wilcox had in view a materialistic rather than an infidel woman, I confess to much sympathy with Mrs. W.'s views.

As I see it, materialistic belief is a sign and result of abnormality. I hold that every normal person has some sort of belief in spirit existence after physical death. That the divine or spirit principle inheres in all life, and that when organic life is evoluted up to the human plane the germ of spirit life becomes capable of unfoldment to sentient, conscious existence and to the development of possibilities and aspirations for the "life beyond."

If spirit life, there must be a spirit organism and subject to such laws as govern organic life on the physical plane. Nature is a unit. One law or principle governs life on all planes. There can be no existence without subsistence. The spirit organism must feed and function or it dies, same as the physical organism. Use develops; non-use enfeebles, deteriorates and invites disease and death.

To build up a healthy, rugged spirit organism, capable of withstanding and surviving the vicisities of earth, and particularly that most trying of all, physical disolution, the spirit organism must use its faculties and powers. It must function. Without this, death is inevitable. All Nature declares that the wages of the sin of misuse or disuse is death.

So, when you find a person who denies spirit, or who does not know wheth r he has a spirit or not and who does not believe in or hope for a "life beyond," you have encountered a being in whom spirit life has probably become extinct, for life must surely manifest itself. The law of the survival of the fit is inexorable and applies to all life.

We get what we live for and strive for. We grow or develop in the direction of our ideals. Thus, thought becomes creative. Every man—indeed every life germ is the architect of its own destiny. Without purpose, aspiration, striving and persistence nothing is realized. We will never see Boston unless we first believe there is such a place, second, desire to go there, and third, turn our steps in that direction.

Mrs. Wilcox is right. She is "away up" in divine science—in divine philosophy. While the widower is "a gittin'," let him "git" the best. It is all the same price. His little girls should have such environments as will facilitate the unfoldment of their higher natures. A woman without spirituality and without hope or aspiration for anything above or beyond the narrow confines of the material world is bereft of woman's crowning glory.

By the delicate texture of her nature, and by the acuteness of her sensations, intuitions and perceptions, woman stands closer to infinity than does man. Morally and spiritually she is above him. She is therefore man's proper guide in the moral and spiritual life, and at her normal and best estate will lead him constantly upward to the higher altitudes of human development.

He who denies spirit, disputes evolutionary progression and sets metes and bounds to nature is a chump. Let us "claim everything," and play the game of life for all there is in it.

Crackerets.

The world owes every man a living, but he must know how to collect it.

Girls, do not marry any man unless you are perfectly sure you have the heart to crack his skull if he attempts to approach you when you don't want him.

The king of England says: "This is not a republic"—meaning England. Now we see why the special office of court jester has been discontinued.

An empire by any other name can be just as oppressive.

The patient who gets an old prescription made up over again thinks to beat the doctor, but he plays into the hands of the undertaker.

A prophecy.—When European nations shut American trade out of Asia, America will retaliate by attempting to shut somebody off from the trade of the American continent to the south.

Deserted Wives.

To leave a helpless woman, especially when she has children, is a crime morally, and should be made such legally, and be punishable severely. As a matter of fact, the only remedy which the law offers to a deserted wife is the one of divorce—a remedy which frequently she cares nothing about, and which, still more frequently, she is unable to avail herself of. If the deserting husband remains available she may bring him into court and have him prosecuted for non-support, and the court may order him to give bonds for her support or go to jail. But as a rule, he who is scoundrel enough to desert his wife and children usually clears out and leaves her and them in misery. He is lost to sight, and the children become a public charge or are a source of anguish to their mother, and their attempted support in not a few cases ends in her premature death.

It is pleasant to note that there is a disposition to treat criminals of this character as they should be treated by the law. A measure with this general purpose is now under consideration in the Legislature of this State. The subject, too, is under general discussion, and many wholly worthless suggestions are heard, such as recourse to the whipping post, as the proper punishment of such wretches.—St. Paul Globe.

Marriage—Its Origin and Development.

According to previous announcement this was the subject of discussion last Sunday afternoon—March 31—at the Chicago Society of Anthropology which holds its weekly meetings in Oriental Hall, Masonic Temple, seventeenth floor. This large and beautiful hall was well filled with very attentive listeners, scarcely a vacant seat left. A noticeable feature was the presence of a large proportion of physicians of both sexes. Appropriately, too—as being naturally interested in the subject, at least half the audience were women.

The usual custom of the Society is to give the first speaker thirty minutes for the opening address and fifteen minutes at the close of the discussion, in which to answer his critics, who are expected to occupy one hour and a half, divided into five or, at most, ten minute speeches. On this occasion the first speaker was allowed forty-five minutes for his opening and about twenty minutes for his closing remarks.

Without preliminary the speaker of the afternoon—who as announced in last week's issue, was the editor of Lucifer, began by quoting Abraham Lincoln's famous aphorism, "Labor was before Capital and is superior to it," adding that Lincoln could have said with equal truth, Labor is the creator of Capital, and the creature can have no rights as against its creator.

Proceeding the speaker introduced his subject somewhat after this fashion:

Likewise I take the ground that Man was before Institutions and is superior to them.

Man is the creator of institutions, and the creature can have no rights as against its creator.

Our modern society seems based on the exact opposite principle, hypothesis or assumption, namely, that institutions were before man and are superior to him. That institutions create man, and that he can have no rights as against his creator. That when it comes to a conflict of rights—paraphrasing Cowper—their rights and claims are paramount and must extinguish his.

Notably is this true of the institution known as marriage. We talk and we act as though marriage was before man—woman and man—and is superior to him—to them. That when a conflict of rights occurs, marriage must be preserved inviolate, whatever may become of man—the individual man or woman.

John Stuart Mill is reported as saying, "that marriage is now the only form of serfdom authorized by law." History shows that whoever undertakes to overthrow any form of serfdom has a hard time of it—is sure to encounter the most determined opposition,—in the shape of misrepresentation, slander, social ostracism, fines, imprisonment and sometimes death.

Often the serfs themselves join their masters against her or him who would liberate them. During the American civil war the great mass of slaves preferred to stay with their masters and raise the crops, thus furnishing the means necessary to carrying on the war against their would-be deliverers.

Count Leo Tolstoi, relates that when he called his serfs together and told them he had been robbing them too long—through land rent—and that he now proposed to restore to them their natural right to the soil and its opportunities for building up in themselves a noble, self-reliant independent manhood, these serfs, after listening awhile in silence, got together in little groups to discuss this strange freak of their landlord—wondering what new trick the benevolent old crank was now trying to spring upon them, and finally concluded that it was better to leave well enough alone, and flatly refused to accept Tolstoi's offer. They had never known what it was not to pay rent to their landlord. They had accepted rent-paying as the God-ordained lot of the laboring man; hence feared a change so sweeping—so radical and revolutionary—such as free land implied. They had found their present landlord a kind-hearted master and much preferred a good master to no master at all.

Just so it is when we talk to the great majority of women in regard to self-ownership of person—in regard to freedom in love relations and freedom of maternity. When we tell them these are their natural right and that they do themselves and their offspring a great wrong when they neglect or refuse to take and exercise these rights; when we talk thus they turn against us and accuse us of trying to overthrow morality, trying to turn the world back into barbarism and savagery if not into primeval chaos. And when one of their own sex dares to assert her right to self-hood, to self-ownership—dares to live a free, non-invasive, unconventional life—dares to claim the right to motherhood without first bowing her neck to the yoke of wedlock, she is branded by her sisters as a wanton; branded a rebel against God, morality and government; driven from respectable society; driven, if possible, into the ranks of unlicensed body-prostitution—the necessary and inevitable accompaniment and complement of the licensed kind—marriage; driven to a living death so pathetically described by Leckey, in "History of European Morals," Vol. 2, page 283:

"There has risen in society a figure which is certainly the most mournful, and, in some respects, the most awful, upon which the eye of the moralist can dwell. The unhappy being who is scorned and insulted as the vilest of her sex and doomed to wretchedness and an early death, appears in every age as the perpetual symbol of the degradation and sinfulness of man. Herself the supreme type of vice, she is ultimately the efficient guardian of virtue. But for her the unchallenged purity of countless happy homes would be polluted, and not a few who, in the pride of their untempted chastity, think of her with an indignant shudder, would have known the agony of remorse and despair. On that one ignoble and degraded form are concentrated the passions that might have filled the world with shame. She remains while civilizations rise and fall the eternal priestess of humanity, blasted for the sins of the people."

The speaker then briefly alluded to other and subsidiary forms of serfdom, especially that based on land-rent, land-monopoly.

The main portion of the lecture was given under the guise of fiction. In order that his hearers might the better lay aside for the time being their inherited prejudices against plain speaking on the subject of marriage, the gender sense, reproduction, etc., the speaker assumed that he himself as well as his auditors were Martians—inhabitants of Mars, who "neither marry nor are given in marriage," consequently know nothing of marriage serfdom.

He assumed that some seventy years ago he had been banished from Mars to Earth, as a punishment for his sins, and that now, his term of banishment ended, he is again on his native heath, trying to explain to his old friends and neighbors the origin and history of the peculiar institutions, the unscientific, the crude, the irrational institutions still popular among the undeveloped Earthites.

Press of other work and lack of space prevent a further synopsis of Sunday's lecture before the Society of Anthropology, for this issue. Suffice it to say that after the recess, the president, Mr. Wilcox, a half dozen members, also a few visitors, took a hand in reviewing and criticizing the lecture. It is hoped a synopsis of these criticisms will appear in these columns in the near future. M. H.

Comment—Various.

CONTINUED STORIES.

From time to time suggestions have been made by Lucifer's readers recommending the story plan as helpful to fix and popularize the radical ideals advocated in its pages. There is certainly much to be said in favor of this plan, and when a really well-written story is offered us we are glad to insert it—especially if short. Our older readers will doubtless remember that some years ago we printed a story of considerable length by "May Huntly"—a story of the transition, so to speak, from serfdom to freedom—especially showing how freedom of maternity may even now be practicalized. That story was entitled "Hagar Lyndon," and received much commendation. Those who enjoyed the reading of that serial will doubtless be glad to see the name of its author appear again in Lucifer. The storiette, "Nature and the Law," begun in this issue, will, as we think, well repay perusal.

VIVISECTION AND ANTI-VIVISECTION.

It is sincerely to be hoped that our friends will keep an even temper when discussing the much controverted question of vivisection. That this is a question of much interest to the humanitarian, as well as the scientist and philosopher, goes without saying. That Mr. James, Mr. Clarkson and all who have written us on the subject are humane, honest and earnest in their views, and in the expression of their views, I verily believe. That this matter is of sufficient importance to human welfare to deserve a place among the subjects discussed in our columns I also believe. Let us then vindicate our claims to the liberality that is so very essential to the pursuit and discovery of truth, by keeping within the bounds of courtesy and respect for the rights and opinions of others.

CRITICISM AGAIN.

As between adverse, hostile or unappreciative criticism, on the one hand, and the wholly appreciative or commendatory sort I incline to welcome the adverse and hostile sort. It stimulates introspection, self-examination, self-discipline, and thereby promotes self-knowledge and improvement. Yet if we receive none but adverse criticism in or for our work, we would doubtless become discouraged and cease our struggles for the betterment of the condition of our fellows, if not of ourselves also. Hence it is probably best for Lucifer, its work and its editorial management, that we receive, as now, a mixture—that the sweet and the sour be administered in doses somewhat alternating. Having inserted in recent issues, notices that seemed not intended to be complimentary, it will perhaps be of interest to our readers to hear that some of our editorial contemporaries appreciate the work being done by our little journals.

Under the heading, "The Editorial Hammer," the April No. of "Brann's Iconoclast" of this city, a monthly magazine that claims a circulation of more than two hundred thousand copies per annum, has this to say of Lucifer, its name, its work and its editor:

To earnest students of the problem of life there is much in the history of the editor of Lucifer that is of the greatest interest. No one among the thinkers of the day has had a more eventful career than Moses Harman. He has suffered imprisonment for the utterance of his honest opinions; has known what it is to be ostracised by the very people he has tried to benefit, and has lived to see his views adopted by thousands of those who at one time gloried in his persecution. For many years Moses Harman, through the columns of his paper, Lucifer, has advocated the economic freedom of women, and has fought for the advancement of broad and liberal ideas. The bitter foe of religious sectarianism and orthodox fanaticism, he has lived to find himself the leader of a determined band of reform advocates, who respect and revere his name.

To religious fanatics the name Lucifer is a synonym of his satanic majesty, while in reality Lucifer was the bearer of light, Moses Harman is a bearer of light to the benighted wayfarers of the twentieth century, and long will his influence be felt among those who earnestly seek progress.

In the same vein is the utterance of an old-time reader and helper, a good lady friend whose home is in the Hawkeye state. When sending a list of names for samples—also the names of two new subscribers for Lucifer, she takes occasion to refer to the work and the managers of Lucifer in the following very complimentary way, not intended for publication, of course, but for which she will please accept sincerest thanks:

I feel like the Kansas lady with reference to Editor Macdonald's compliment—calling us "tough." I thoroughly enjoyed your explanation, and wait with no little interest his reply. I like the "Truth Seeker," but never put it ahead of our little Lucifer. I think he [the aforesaid editor] might have managed his little fling in some way that would have been easily understood even by us "illuminated toughs." I never see anything in Lucifer but what I think shows the impress of master minds. You and Lillian never handle any subject in a way I cannot approve, and wonder how any friend of Lucifer can find fault.

Too late for insertion in this week's Lucifer we have just received a letter from Editor Macdonald, explaining the authorship and purpose of the words objected to by our Kansas correspondent. This explanation will appear in our next.

DESERTED WIVES.

Elsewhere in this issue is found a selection from the "St Paul Globe," with this heading, showing the futility of present marriage laws, as a protection to wives and children. The writer advocates more law as the remedy for the "crime" of wife-desertion, and says a "measure with this general purpose is now before the legislature of this state"—Minnesota—and that "many worthless suggestions are heard, such as resort to the whipping post," etc.

After a few more millenniums of worse than useless legislation it will perhaps dawn upon the minds of editors of secular journals that the real cause of the evils complained of lies in the attempt to control the personal and private affairs of women and men, and that freedom of mothers—liberty with responsibility to self and child, coupled with a rational economic system, is the only real cure for the evils of dependent motherhood and childhood. What Goeth On at Present.

BY JABBERJOHN.

The angel is troubling the waters in the pool of Manhattan and the effervescence is bubbling at a lively rate. Thought is being stirred up in an unprecedented way. While Russian students are striking for their liberty one of Russia's noblest citizens, Peter Kropotkin, is in New York, the guest of some of New York's best citizens. He will deliver there three lectures the tickets for which are entirely disposed of.

A committee of ardent reformers has engaged Professor George D. Herron to deliver a series of six lectures in Cooper Union and to repeat the same lectures in the Park Theatre, Brooklyn. It is anticipated that these lectures will be as provocative of thought and as productive of good works as the course of lectures he has just concluded in Chicago.

Emma Goldman announces that she will repeat the lecture tour which she made so successfully two years ago, and solicits engagements. Letters addressed to her at 50 First street, New York City will receive her attention. It is a matter of especial congratulation that the Russian methods of suppression practised upon Miss Goldman have failed of their intended effect. An unprincipled judge tried to stop her talking by managing to get her into prison. That judge is dead, and Miss Goldman is still talking. That judge had a right as a citizen to oppose her thought and to show, if he could, wherein she was in error. He had no right to pervert the functions of his office in the effort to silence her. He was under the most solemn obligations to protect her in her right to free speech however he may have differed from her in matters of opinion.

Suppression of thought is like compression of water, when restraining forces are applied in one direction new outlets must be found in other directions, so that on the whole the efforts at suppression in this country have not realized the expectations of the suppressors.

Who is the Infidel?

BY L. M. BRYAN.

I am both surprised and amused at Ella Wheeler Wilcox's article quoted in Lucifer, No. 856. Surprised that so gifted a woman should be so superstitious, amused at her fit of hysterics about the poor "woman infidel," who "is as unnatural as a flower which breathes poison instead of perfume." Mrs. Wilcox's acquaintance with women infidels must be of the vicarious kind, formed second-hand from Evangelists at revivals.

Yes, I've learned a good deal about infidels that way myself, and then after meeting them in the flesh I was reminded of what Josh Billings said, "That it is better not to know so much than to know so much that isn't so."

I was also reminded of what a writer in Lucifer said some time ago—That the world is full of paradoxes, and among them he said we would find the Atheist to be the only devout person; that the God believers were the real blaspbemers. Now I call Mrs. Wilcox as witness to prove that he is correct, at least in her case. She thinks "one who studies even the rudiments of the marvelous construction of the universe, must thrill with reverence for something we call God."

But it's her God, mind you, for she says: "Not the petty, spiteful little beings many churches worship as God." It is sad to think that so "many churches" are worshipping the wrong God! Why does not Mrs. Wilcox's God enlighten these people? Are they not devout, are they not sincere? Do they not believe that they are leaning on the "Divine Arm" just as much as she is?

But no doubt these "many churches" would resent Mrs. Wilcox's assertion that she, not they, had hold of the "horns of the Altar," and would blaspheme her God in return.

It is the same old story: "He who kicks my doG kicks me!"

VARIOUS VOICES.

M. B. Jennings, Monroe Center, Mich.:—From some unexplained source, a copy of your paper, Lucifer, came to me a short time ago, and I like its talk so well, and the principles it advocates, that I want to read it awhile, and enclose twenty-five cents for the "Prodigal Daughter" and the thirteen weeks offer of subscription to Lucifer. You also advertise other books that I shall send for as soon as I can. I wish such a paper as Lucifer could be read in every family in this country. It speaks the truth, and shames the devil.

Sadie A. Magoon, Los Angeles, Calif., Sta., A:—We received your good letter with postoffice money order for $11.25. I would like through Lucifer to thank all who so kindly and promptly responded to the unexpected (to us) petition from our friend, M. C., and to say to them all, that if we go, as we wish, to Home, Washington, we are reasonably sure that we can return to the donors the money sent us, and shall feel much better to do so. In that case we ask the dear friends to consider it a loan, and to accept our sincere thanks for the favor which came so opportunely. For your kind words, and interest in our welfare we are also grateful, to you, dear friend Harman.

Silas A. Shaw, Me.:—I am married, but if I were single I would never take an oath before priest or magistrate to love anybody for life. It's a matter of love, not life, and concerns only two persons, the lover and the loved, or the mutual lovers. I would no more take an oath before a priest or magistrate to love one moment than I would take an oath to hate. In fact I manage to live very nicely without a priest, and I should like to try the experiment of life without paying the expenses of a magistrate. I have no use for him now. The death of the body of my first sweetheart has not changed my love, and I expect to love after I have passed beyond the influence of priest and magistrate.

James B. Elliott, Phila. Pa.:—Susie Patton, our dear comrade and faithful member of the Ladies' Liberal League, and worker in the cause of reform in this city, died on the 25th. inst., after a lingering illness. Her funeral was attended by those who had been her co-workers. Addresses were made by Mrs. Miller, Mary Hanson, Mrs. Falkenstein. By her special request her remains were cremated at the Philadelphia crematory. It is deserving of special mention that notwithstanding the surrounding influence of family ties and Miss Patton's Catholic education, her courage was supreme. Reason and not religion was her comforter. Having discharged her obligations to her friends and community she had no fears for the future. Principle was stronger than passion, and she was an uncompromising foe to hypocrisy and sham, of every kind, and to those who injured her she was just, and recognized their right to do the wrong which she condemned. She loved children and especially those born of free unions, and to those she was specially kind and gentle.

"The record of a generous life runs like a vine around the memory of our dead, and every unselfish act is now a perfumed flower."

Enclosed find a token from her remains.

[The "token" was a bunch of flowers and evergreens. I can scarcely say that the news contained in the above letter is bad, or saddening. While it is but natural that we should feel a pang of regret on hearing of the departure of a friend, from the earth life, there is often a sense of relief, also, when we know that that friend had been a great sufferer, and that conditions promised, to her or to him, little if anything better in the future. Susie Patton was long a subscriber to and faithful friend of Lucifer and its work. We shall miss her letters of encouragement and hope. Who knows but that her work in her short mortal life will, in future years, bring forth fruit a thousand-fold for the advancement and emancipation of humankind. M. H.]

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents.

What The Young Need to Know: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers; 307 pages. 25 cents.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

Nature and the Law.

BY MAY HUNTLEY.

PART II.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

At last Philip Heywood was ready to present his young ward to some of his most intimate friends. On the evening appointed, his spacious mansion glowed with lights, the air quivered under its load of fragrance, flowers vibrated and languished everywhere, and the vista of rooms looked like a materialized dream of paradise. Young Fern, arrayed in a curious, rich and half-barbaric costume which had been prepared for him, wandered through the house in bewildered admiration, unconscious that he was himself the central figure of the occasion. The friends came early; for they were inquisitive, having heard many suggestions of Philip's unique "specimen." They did not exactly intend to impale him on a pin for leisurely examination, but they were not likely to let him go, until his habits, wants, manner of expression, processes of thought, capabilities of feeling and emotion were duly analyzed and classified.

With one old sage was brought a bright young creature as beautiful and innocent of the world as Fern himself. The girl had been motherless from her infancy and had been raised and educated by two faded, gentle old ladies in a secluded old mansion where no one ever came. In the course of nature these sweet old people died, and the father, an old man in years and a still older one in study had been obliged to bring her home. She was still an embarassing novelty to him and he brought her with him because he did not know what else to do with her. Of how she was ultimately to be disposed he had not yet ventured to think.

When Fern returned to the room his guardian occupied, he saw reclining on an ottoman a most wonderful being. A pure dark face, touched into rosy radiance on cheeks and perfect lips, glorified with eyes of deep, dark, shadowy luster, and framed in a mass of jetty, silken waving hair; a form of exquisite proportions, slender, sylph-like, poised, it seemed not resting above the silk cushions of her sofa. Philip briefly made the young people known to each other, and continued to talk with his guest apparently without noticing them further. Fern came no nearer for some time, but contented himself with gazing at the young beauty with all his soul in his eyes. The girl looked, blushed, drooped her eyelids and so kept them but for one slow, bewildering glance from beneath the heavy eyelids. He came towards her presently, and reverently touched one little hand. "You are very beautiful," he murmured. "Are you real? Who are you, will you let me ask? Will you vanish pretty soon?"

"I am Christobel. I need not go for some time yet."

"I am glad. May I sit here near you?"

"I think you may."

"I am very happy here. My heart is warmer and life seems sweeter now. I wish I might never leave you."

She smiled, but did not answer. He began to speak after a few moments of delicious silence; he told her in simple natural words of his wild, free home in the wilderness, of the beautiful creatures he had known there among the trees and bushes and rocks; of his wanderings over untracked hills, of his dreamings, of his horse. She listened, sweetly absorbed. When Philip called him to come and speak to the older guests, he demurred.

"I do not want to talk to any one else. Let me remain here. I am very happy as I am."

"But you are breaking a law of ettiquette, my dear Fern, to monopolize our young friend all the evening."

"It seems to me that all the things one wants to do here in your world are against some law." But they gathered around him and made him talk while they studied him. As Christobel remained near he did not object.

When the evening wore away and the party broke up, Fern still kept near Christobel. She was being wrapped for her trip home; and he was gazing sadly at her lovely face. "Will you not stay here?" he asked.

"I must go home with my father," she answered simply.

"Well, can he not stay too? Surely Philip has plenty for all; don't go away. Why should you when it will make us both unhappy?"

He was told that that would be impossible.

"I do not understand it. But let me go home with you then. You like to have me near you, do you not, Christobel?"

She only smiled and looked down, and the older people now interfered.

"It is impossible for us to remain longer together. The hour is late, and it is time to retire for sleep. We will meet again, soon," the father of Christobel remarked.

Fern was forced to say goodbye, which he did rather gloomily. When the guests had gone he said a little sulkily,

"I suppose you have some ridiculous law against my remaining with that beautiful girl as long as she and I like?"

"Most certainly, my young friend. Let us retire now and get to sleep as quickly as possible."

After this the young people were often together. The group which met that evening were congenial and were following the same lines of study, so that they frequently met at one or the other of the homes. These wise old men who knew so much that they were moving encyclopedias, were also so far from their youth and so simple that they never realized what was likely to happen between two such persons as Fern and Christobel. Therefore they were astonished beyond measure when Fern came to them with his blue eyes deep and sparkling with feeling and told them that he loved Christobel and believed she loved him and that they wanted to be together.

"I suppose of course you must have some terrible law against this because it is so sweet and beautiful, but I want to know what it is, and what can be done to evade or get away from it in some way. For I warn you I will not obey if it keeps me from Christobel."

Philip Heywood recovered himself first.

"There is nothing wrong in your loving one another, my dear Fern, if her father consents to your marriage and you believe yourself capable of supporting her in the style to which she has been accustomed. You must ask her father's consent to marry her as the first step."

"To marry her! What is that? What does it mean?"

"It is this. When you have made up your mind that you love and wish to live with and care for a woman and can be true to her and are sure that she loves you in the same way, and will give up all else for you, you go to a minister or a magistrate and he pronounces a ceremony over you and you each promise that you will love and cherish the other until death parts you; he pronounces you man and wife and you belong to each other entirely, and no one has a right to come between you. She is yours, she promises to obey you in everything; no other man has a right to come near her if you so desire, or love her or even admire her."

Fern stood with his mouth open apparently struck speechless by these to him, very strange words. He remained silent, evidently pondering over what he had heard with great intensity. Presently he said,

"Does this ceremony inevitably bind us like that? Is there no other way?"

"No respectable way; of course you would never do anything that would bring sorrow to Christobel."

"Heaven forbid! Then I must bind her to me in this manner, if I love her and wish to honor her?"

"You must."

"Make her belong to me, be my property, be obliged to do as I say, forbid her happiness with any one else. How can she, poor innocent girl, tell that she will love me and me alone all the rest of her life? How dare I be so presumptuous as to think I can satisfy all the aspirations of her lovely nature for all the years she is to live? And what is this you say about support? I will be bound to care for her? All that I can do then will only be a fulfilling of my contract under the law? I cannot show her any little care or tenderness as a voluntary devotion on my part? If I am obliged to do everything, what way is there left for me to show my love in some spontaneous service for her? No, no, this bondage you tell me of, is terrible to both. I will never submit to it."

"Then you must give up Christobel. You would be wronging her in the worst way man can wrong a woman if you live with her without marriage. Would you make of her a thing that the people hoot at in the streets?"

Fern turned pale and reached out trembling hands as though to grasp at something for support. He tottered to a seat and covered his face with his hands with a low moan. There was nothing Philip could say; he turned and left him.

Very early one morning when the rising sun's long rays bathed the whole world in a roseate beauty belonging only to the dawn, two people stood together with clasped hands looking into each other's eyes. They were very beautiful and they were very sad. He had been saying something to her which she seemed to find difficult to understand, but she was full of trust in him.

"And so, dear one, there is no other way. I cannot make you my property, I cannot ask you to become as nothing only as I represent you. I love you as a free, beautiful, spontaneous creature, because it is you, adorable, sweet, pure, at liberty to grow and develop the best that is in you. I do not know what you would be like as bound, as a thing belonging to another; perhaps I might not love you so—I do not know. I will never agree to bind you thus. Never!"

"But you love me?"

"Better than myself. I cannot live and know that I have caused you sorrow or made you less of a glorious creature than you would have been without me. I am going back to my native wilds, and it may be to death."

"I will go with you. We will die together if we cannot live so."

"Will you go? There will be no one to hoot at you there."

"You will be there."

"And I would be your disgrace, your sorrow. But oh, I will be tender of you, sweet."

They caught the divinity of love as they gazed into each others souls, and fell into one another's arms. Then they turned like two children and walked away, hand in hand toward the wilderness, away from the sun.

That night a terrible storm broke over the country. The winds, the thunder and lightning, the rain combined to lash all nature into a furious pandemonium. Trees fell across the paths, the streams swelled and became torrents, bridges were swept away and crushed nature despaired. A party of horsemen came in the dim, gloomy morning to the edge of a roaring flood, once an innocent stream. They found amid a pile of debris, two beautiful young lifeless forms, clasped in each others arms, the wet locks of each, golden and black, wound round both heads, both marble-like faces.

The Secret of Long Life.

BY J. F. MORGAN.

It lies in breath and chest exercise. If you would have good health, brilliant mind, enjoy life, be happy and successful, live long and be physically and mentally strong, you must harmoniously tune yourself up, find out your correct key note and build for yourself an individual physical body, the same as you would build a material house in which to live, and stop paying rent and take the chances of being evicted by the landlord—all of which is very easily done when you know the laws of breath and health culture.

Deep breathing generates vitality, and is an exercise that if scientifically practiced will raise the physical standard to a condition of perfect harmony, which is good health. The pupil is taught to sit in an upright position, spinal column straight, limbs and other muscles relaxed, with weight of the body balanced upon the base of the spinal column and weight of lower body balanced on the balls of the feet, hands resting lightly on the knees with thumbs out, since the will power is represented in the thumb, and a closed thumb represents a negative condition. In walking we should close the fists, since an open hand is liable to absorb all the vibration that is afloat in the atmosphere. That is the cause of sensitive ladies feeling depleted after mingling with a crowd. I would suggest to sensitive ladies, when on the crowded streets and compelled to be seated in a car with a gross physical man, to lock themselves up by crossing the right foot over the left and closing and pressing the first fingers with the thumb, and hold the thought that, I am an Egg and my shell extends four feet from me, and no one can break through my shell or atmosphere.

Breath is life. Correct breathing is the most important step toward consciousness of life, To gain the greatest benefits from breathing it is necessary to begin to breathe the individual breath. The purpose and object of such rythmical breathing is to attract, retain and distribute the life principle which is contained in the oxygen of the air we breathe, and manifests its greatests effects during the light period, from sunrise to sunset. The result of this is the building of life tissues throughout the body, the setting of the brain functions into their normal condition, the development of the twelve senses to the highest degree, the increase of the vibrations of the ganglia of the nervous system, the regulation of the circulation of the blood and its purification, and the expansion of the magnetic circles of individuality in which all live, move and have their being.

This breath begins with the filling of the upper lobes of the lungs, thus opening the cells of the entire lungs, which is the greatest factor in man's existence—the mainspring of life—setting all the magnets of organic existence into activity, normalizing or centralizing the cellular tissue, building substance, insuring longevity, and consequent perfect youthfulness. The newly born child breathes first before giving attention to feeding.

Where the breathing is faint it must be established by vigorous manipulations to such a degree as to give the necessary vigor and force before nursing. Should breathing fail, life is lost and no force will retain or regain it. The breath must be full, regular and easy, without strain or a feeling of discomfort to any part of the system.

Physical culture, to be of benefit, must necessarily pay attention to perfect breathing, since through the applied breath the nervous system becomes normalized, and the muscles are strengthened and developed without apparent effort. The individual breath being properly established, pure and wholesome ideas will follow because of the centralized sense condition, resulting in common sense. Then it will be known what, when, and how much to eat and drink. Instead of filling the stomach with food sufficient for eight or ten persons, the requisite amount for one person only will be used. Sickness, constant struggle through life, extreme wealth and poverty, the result of unbalanced brain conditions, will no longer be known. The medical students will not write prescriptions, but will be in the kitchen superintending the cooking and preparation of foods; the patience of the pharmacist will no longer be tried by the compounding of drugs, but he will derive his principal revenue from the sale of cosmetics, lotions, perfumes, etc. Medical schools will turn into cooking schools, where formulæ will be studied for the preparation of various foods. Physical culture and gymnastics will take an elevation to higher realms.

Correct breathing builds up the brain. We must learn how to take brain breath and not stomach breath. The only way to accomplish this is to concentrate the mind and control every vibration of the nerves and polarize every atom of the entire system.—"Thought," Almeda, Calif.

Notes and Comments.

BY C. F. HUNT.

Mark Twain scored the missionaries because, with the aid soldiers, they levied tribute from many towns for damages done to the property of missionaries, to the extent, as was reported, of thirteen times the original damage. When the correct report came that the amount levied was only one and one third times the amount destroyed, the missionaries in this country wanted Mr. Twain to apologize, which he refused to do, replying that one third was just as much theft as thirteen fold, and if anything was taken from any person not proved guilty of the original offense, all the reprisal was theft. Mark Twain is a heretic, but can give missionaries points on ethics.

Miss Alta Rockefeller says in the "Chicago American:"

"How can happiness be purchased with money? Are there not many things which make us profoundly miserable that money cannot avert? And isn't it well known that those favored by fortune are more sensitive to the needle pricks of life than any other persons? I am not happy. Say so to all those who envy me. I am not a philosopher, but I have thoughts. Others have been taught to think by poverty, but I have been taught by riches."

Think of stopping off right here without telling what the thoughts are. Thieves of humorous proclivities sometimes sell the plunder back to the owners. Mr. Rockefeller sells back to the people the oil and iron taken out of the earth which belongs to them. The thoughts of the recipients of such money ought to be interesting.

I have been taken to task for my hint that Mr. Franklin H. Wentworth ought to tell why Mr. Rockefeller seems more powerful than God who desires that all people should possess the earth. My conception of God is the old and obsolete one, I am told, the modern idea being something that cannot be explained but can be felt. It is vaguely asserted that God is the Center of the Universe, whether a conscious or unconscious force is not known. He is the All Force, and may be intelligent. Those who hold these views think that discussion with materialists is useless, the latter being away back in the realm of reason, quite unable to comprehend the Intuitive 400.

God is either an intelligence or He is not. If He is merely the Force of the universe, which is in harmony with the ultimate welfare of man, then the materialists and the Intuitive 400 are in perfect accord. If God is at the center of the universe, there must be a circumference, and both are inconceivable. If God is intelligence he must be an individual. If Force, is He intelligent in the various forms of force? Is light intelligent? Is heat, motion, or electricity intelligent? If He is a loving Father does he enjoy seeing His children quarreling over the land that He intends all should enjoy via single tax? He is unable or unwilling to stop the quarrel. No human parent would refuse to act in such a case.

Admitting my crudities in the spiritual line, I am reading up, having just taken in hand "The Law of Psychic Phenomena," by T. J. Hudson, LL.D. and regret that I have only a doubtful quality of reason to bring to bear upon what he says, but no intuition.

Mr. Hudson adopts as a "working hypothesis" the theory that man has two minds, objective and subjective. The first uses reason and the five senses; the second "perceives by intuition." "It performs its highest functions when the objective senses are in abeyance." The subjective mind can reason only deductively, and gets its premises by suggestion, accepting everything offered, good and bad, no matter how absurd, but reasons correctly from such premises.

"When the subjective usurps complete control the individual goes insane." "The result is a mind filled with the grossest superstition."

The objective mind is supposed to control most of the time as a rational guide for the man. It is evident that the subjective mind cannot be trusted, yet we are told that it is nothing more or less than The Soul, "being capable of sustaining an existence independently of the body." "The whole history of subjective phenomena goes to show that the nearer the body approaches the condition of death, the stronger becomes the demonstrations of the powers of the soul. The irresistible inference is that when the soul is freed entirely from its trammels of flesh, its powers will attain perfection, its memory will be absolute." Eternal life, then is the perfection of insanity. The Soul will go on accepting every suggestion as gospel truth, never progressing for it cannot reason inductively. "God himself cannot reason inductively," says Mr. Hudson.

The objective mind appears to die with the body, but I cannot find where Mr. Hudson tells how the soul is to get on without it. Says he: "If any doubts the wisdom of investing the objective mind with the controlling power in the dual organization, let him visit a mad-house. There he will see all shades and degrees of subjective control."

Mr. Hudson's object is to bring "Psychology within the domain of the exact science." I offer the above as proof of how well he has succeeded.

A Fair Question! Dare You Answer It?

BY MEDICUS.

A Brooklyn girl has suffered assault from three brutal white ruffians, and as a natural result of this crime she may be on the way to maternity. Let us suppose that in this case, or some other similar atrocious one, the worst result is a fact, would the parents and the victim be justified in seeking its annulment, or would that be another crime? Would the law permit any interference with the curse of enforced maternity, or would it compel the unwilling and much abused young woman to bring forth the kind of devil that committed the crime? If perchance law would prevent illegitimacy and "save the honor" of the victim by enforcing the rapist to marry her, in this instance, which of the three would the law select for this honor?

Passionate Love—Its Relation to Offspring.

In last Lucifer some account was given of a lecture on "Marriage, Its Origin and Development," in Oriental Hall, Masonic Temple, Chicago. Among the authors cited in that lecture is Ella Wheeler Wilcox. In the "Chicago American" of March 7, the author of "Poems of Passion" and of hundreds of essays and poems that show genius of high if not the very highest order, has this to say:

Motherhood ought to be, but rarely is, a proof of the perfect mating of two souls.

I have heard more than one mother of several children make the awful confession that she had not the slightest understanding of love or passion as she heard those emotions described in books or by poets. She was fond of her husband, one wife said, but considered her maternal offices as a duty only.

I trust she was mistaken. Children conceived and born under such conditions are, to my thinking, the illegitimate offsprings of earth. No law of man—no words pronounced by church or court—can make such children legitimate or well-born.

There must be, at least on the mother's part, a strong love and an abiding affection, and a complete abandon of her heart and mind upon the altar of love to render motherhood a sacred and successful office.

All the really great souls of earth were conceived and born from such a passion.

The reason there are so few great souls is because there are so few great passions.

With Mrs. Wilcox I believe that only well born children are legitimate, and that to be well born there must be, at least on the mother's part, a strong love and an abiding affection, and a complete abandon of her heart and mind upon the altar of love, to render motherhood a sacred and successful office.

I believe that in this paragraph Ella Wheeler Wilcox gives voice, by implication at least, to two of the most vital truths connected with the problem of human improvement, —human happiness or misery, namely,

First, that good motherhood is of incomparably greater importance in the work of human reproduction than is good fatherhood.

Second. That to realize the best possible product there must be passionate attraction—there must be "a complete abandon of her [the woman's] heart and mind upon the altar of love." All considerations of a prudential, mercenary, moralistic, or even religious character must be forgotten for the time being, in an overmastering fury, a divine madness, so to speak, to meet and blend with the object of her passionate desire. Elsewhere in her writings Mrs. Wilcox gives voice to the same sentiment when she makes her heroine say that she would gladly "drop down to sweet hell," if only she could make the drop while in the arms of her lover.

Incidentally Mrs. Wilcox alludes to a great truth; one that is generally overlooked and ignored, namely, the fact that it is not necessary that an overpowering passion should be felt by the father, in order that the child may be well born. It is not in the nature of things as we find them, however, that the man to whom a woman is attracted in the way herein described, should be indifferent, or that he would be repelled and disgusted by her womanly advances. If at a distance woman idealizes a man who is not magnetically adapted to her, on nearer association she discovers her error and rectifies her mistake before the stage of creative blending is reached—under normal conditions.

I believe most emphatically that "all the great souls of earth were conceived and born from such a passion," and that "the reason there are so few great souls is because there are so few great passions," and hence the question very naturally arises,

What effect have the laws and customs in regard to the intimate association of women and men, upon the great passion that creates great souls?

Have they the relation of cause and effect?

Does marriage,—institutional marriage—produce, preserve, or promote this great passion?

On the contrary, is it not notorious that "Marriage is love's miscarriage"?

Is it not true that the intimate daily and nightly association of the married pair inevitably destroys the passionate attraction described by Mrs. Wilcox as essential to the creation of great souls?

With her I would fain "trust" that the woman is mistaken who thinks that her own feelings of "physical repulsion for her husband are those of the majority of women," even of those who respect their husbands and who therefore try to do their duty as wives.

Unfortunately for the optimistic view of institutional marriage held by Mrs. Wilcox and many others—and held for many years by myself also—the facts, the patent undeniable facts of the case are against us.

By its fruits let marriage be judged.

Is there a greater proportion of great souls among those conceived and born within the pale of wedlock than among those conceived outside such pale?

Does not the history of the so-called illegitimates or bastards warrant an opposite conclusion? notwithstanding the terrible effect of social ostracism, as well as of the still worse self-condemnation in the mind of the mother, upon all children whose coming is unblessed by priest or magistrate.

Again: If it be true, as Mrs. Wilcox says, that all children conceived and born under conditions described by the wife who said she was "fond of her husband" but had "not the slightest understanding of love or passion,"—and by that other wife who said she "respected her husband as a man" but "confessed a physical repulsion" for him—if all these children are "illegitimate" in the true sense of that word, that is, "not well born," what must we expect from conditions in which there is neither fondness nor respect on the part of the wife towards her husband?

What can we expect of the offspring when the wife, or mother, instead of the overmastering passion that finds its highest heaven in the embrace of the lover, feels herself insulted and outraged by all such attentions on the part of her liege lord, and who would gladly welcome death—of herself or her tormentor—as release from marital bondage?

Knowing only too well, as many of us do, that such is the inmost feeling of a large portion of wives and mothers toward the men whom law, religion and custom make it their solemn duty to submit to, in the most intimate and sacred of all human associations, can we wonder at the number of failures born every day into the world?

Can we wonder at the prevalence of vice, of crime, of sordid greed, of insanity, of idiocy?

Can we wonder that emperors, kings and presidents find little difficulty in filling the ranks of their armies to go forth to rob and murder their fellowmen against whom they can have no cause for quarrel?

Can we wonder that monopolistic robbers find little or no trouble in filling the ranks of ill-paid but obedient wage slaves?

Can we wonder that the masses of wage slaves, farmers and other self-employers, continue voting year after year and age after age, for the same old political machines—under new names, perhaps—notwithstanding all the lessons of bitter experience? M. H.

Responses.

Two weeks ago, under the head "A Word to Our Workers," was printed a few paragraphs asking for co-operative aid in getting Lucifer's claims to recognition before the reading public, special attention being called to the plan of sending the paper ten weeks for ten cents to names of persons known to be interested in radical reforms.

For many months—in fact for many years, we have been sending samples to names furnished by our readers and workers, with very scant returns in the way of increase of yearly subscriptions—although we by no means consider the labor and money lost. Of late a number of these earnest workers have adopted the plan of sending ten cents for a ten weeks trial subscription for their friends and acquaintances, and though only a comparatively small proportion of these become permanent subscribers the results are more encouraging than under the old plan.

Having been frequently called upon to state more specifically the object of our publications a series of articles was begun in 857 in answer to these calls. A large edition of that number was printed in the hope of a largely increased demand for copies to be sent to trial subscribers, and while the responses to our suggestions and request have thus far scarcely equalled expectations—owing perhaps to the fact that our helpers are so widely scattered, and to the other fact that the busy season of the year is now at hand, quite a considerable number of names with the stamps have been sent in, and a few promises made for help later on.

In the hope that many more responses will be received soon the continuation of the series of articles on Lucifer's purpose and history, is still further postponed. M. H.

Comment—Various.

I never could quite forgive George Eliot for killing,—so soon in her sweet and hopefully promising young life—the heroine of the story called "The Mill on the Floss." There seemed to me but one reason for such untimely ending of life, namely, the author saw no way to save the dear innocent girl's reputation (not her character) but to kill her.

Is this the explanation, the cause, of the tragic ending of the young lives of May Huntley's children of nature, in the storiette, "Nature and the Law?" Why does she not let them live long enough to show the superiority of "Love in Freedom," and "Motherhood in Freedom," over the conventional kind or kinds?

I think it was May Huntly who, a few years ago, criticised, adversely, Grant Allen's story, "Woman Who Did," because of its disastrous ending, when the author had so good an opportunity to bring about a very different result.

Perhaps, however, the explanation, in this case is similar to that given by some one for the early death of Mercutio in "Romeo and Juliet," namely, that if Shakespere had not killed Mercutio, Mercutio would have killed Shakespere! The mental strain necessary to keep the ideal humorist up to the high level on which Mercutio was started, would have been too great, even for Shakespere, and the world would have lost its greatest dramatist before many of his later plays were written. So likewise it may be that the mental strain necessary to complete her ideal, and make successful the lives of Christobel and Fera—as conditions now are, would have proved too much, even for the genius of May Huntly, and the result of the sustained effort might have been the shortening of the mortal life of one whose pen and brain force the reform movements of today can ill afford to lose.

THE GOLDMAN LECTURE AGAIN.

The following letter from the "Truth Seeker" office was received too late for insertion last week:

New York, April 1, 1901.

EDITOR LUCIFER:

I note your animadversion upon a sentence or two which appeared in The Truth Seeker of March 23. Let me explain, for you seem unable to "savey," that the comment upon Mr. Terwilliger's complaint of the non-appearance of the report of Emma Goldman's speech was written by Mr. George E. Macdonald, who was having fun with the whole outfit, me as well as the others concerned. I killed the report because Miss Goldman's language, as reported by Mr. Coolridge, was coarse and vulgar, and about four million of The Truth Seeker's subscribers would have jumped on me for printing it—besides, I don't like such talk myself. It seems unnecessary. Last week Mr. George Macdonald gave the substance of Miss Goldman's speech, in his inimitable way, and no one has said a word as to its being peculiar. That is the difference between people of the Goldman type and one who knows how to handle the English language.

My compliments to the unknown lady who calls me a "blatant arrogant." I trust her conscience does not feel as guilty as her language indicates. Yours very truly,

E. M. MACDONALD, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

Replying to the above I would briefly but respectfully query and comment:

How could any one "savey" that G. E. M. writes "The Truth Seeker's" editorial replies to critics? No such statement appears in the paper.

Why try to divide responsibility when every one knows that unsigned and unquoted articles are the editor's own—either by authorship or by adoption?

The "Truth Seeker" is to be congratulated on the size of its subscription list. Judging from the kicks against the late editorial censorship the number of Bro. Macdonald's patrons who would have preferred to see the reporter's version of the Goldman lecture, probably equals if not exceeds those who would have censured the editor for printing it.

Our editor expreses solicitude for the "conscience" of the "unknown lady." Is it not just possible that said lady may reciprocate the compliment by a friendly inquiry about the mental condition of her critic? "Coarse and vulgar" mean about the same, in common parlance, as "obscene" or "nasty." An eastern contemporary sizes up the matter thus: "According to psychology nastiness is a 'subjective' sensation—that is, it exists not in the objective, but in the mind which discerns the nastiness." Is it not just so with coarseness and vulgarity?

Would it not be well for all censors to remember the warning lines: "The gun well aimed at duck or plover, may shoot, but kick its owner over?" M. H.

Press Writers and Press Workers.

BY FRANCIS B. LIVESEY.

The article of Mr. D. Webster Grob, of Hagerstown, Md., in Lucifer of March 2nd, brought me several inquiries. Mr. Grob has now written a circular that will answer all inquirers and we are trying to raise the funds for its publication. With the circular distributed among the seventy odd writers, they can send it to any in their respective localities who need it.

Several of the Liberal papers have been approached relative to allowing some able Press Writers to edit a department in the paper. We have given the Liberal editors a pretty good idea of the work their papers can do to aid us, and I am happy to note that Lucifer and the "Truth Seeker" have lately responded admirably on several occasions. The editors have an advantage over any department editor. The great point in indicating what the Single Taxers call "targets" is that they be indicated quickly. It takes several weeks for a distant writer to get his articles in the Liberal papers and this ruins the chance for the speedy work necessary to get in the secular press. I think, as does Mr. Grob, that the Press Writers should send editorial and other clippings to the Liberal editors and let them speedily answer them themselves or show them as targets for the others, while the Press Writers content themselves with sending in reports now and then of their interesting experiences.

The editor of the "Blue Grass Blade" says he has a worker who sends out several thousand of his "Blades" every week. I think the man's name is Levi. I want to give him some advice. I saw Mr. Moore give a scorching reply to a clergyman. I doubted if he would ever see it, so sent him the clipping. He immediately thanked me for it and said he would thank me to send him a few more, if I had them. Now, where was Mr. Levi in this case? Thus it is that dozens of grand articles appear in the Liberal papers that never meet the eyes of those for whom they were intended. They are no real good to the Liberal man—he knows it all already. It takes stamps, but I cannot resist the call to send them these fighting clippings as often as I can. If Mr. Levi would furnish the stamps and the paper, and if some Liberal worker would take points from me on this matter, the "Blade," or any other liberal paper could be made to do much more iconoclastic work.

Some people think our Press Writers lose time writing for small county papers. This is a mistake; nothing pays so well. The average county paper is dear to the heart of the subscriber. He reads it more carefully than he does the city daily. It seems to be a part of his family. Anything in it on the reform line beards him in his den if he is a churchman or a moss back. The Press Writers need to get all possible work in on those papers, and they need to sustain each other in them, both for the emancipation of the editor and for their own preservation from local ostracism, if not injury.

Press Worker, Mr. George B. Wheeler, 1355 Belmont Ave., Chicago, just gives an admirable sample of work. On April 1st, the Chicago "Record-Herald" gave an editorial on "Board Can Compel Vaccination." Mr. Wheeler, like so many of us, is an anti-vaccinationist. He at once bought twenty-five of the papers and sent them to as many Press Writers. If he sent to each a long letter, as he did to me, he did a day's work. He did this to allow the Writers to at once reply. I am not an expert on the subject and sent my clipping to Dr. M. R. Leverson, Fort Hamilton, New York. Now, the anti-vaccinationists have a paper and a regularly organized society—why do they not apply themselves to this press writing on their special subject? They ought certainly to be able to handle their one subject; while we Press Writers handle dozens.

I have taken great pleasure in sending out a hundred of Lucifer's circulars to high-toned people who never heard of them, and whom they ought to kill or cure. Talking about the ruin wrought by liquor—the ruin wrought by ignorance of sex questions vastly surpasses it; and yet how are the latter reformers muzzled?

Sykesville, Md.

VARIOUS VOICES.

H. E. Allen, Berwick, Ills.:—For the enclosed dollar please set me forward on Lucifer another year. I have been with you ten or twelve years and find Lucifer is about as indispensable in our household as flour and sugar. We receive eighteen other periodicals but your brave little paper holds its own, and more, with all the rest.

Boy, Chicago:—In No. 856 you devote space and energy to jealousy. None of your contributors seem to touch on one phase of the subject which I can best describe by an illustration: Boy and Girl—lovers. Boy invites Girl to go to a theatre. Girl pleads weariness. Boy goes with another girl, or alone. Girl goes to a ball with another boy and dances off her weariness. Boy learns of it. Reproaches Girl. Girl claims she has the right to go with whom she will. Boy concedes right. Nevertheless he feels aggrieved. There's no thought of asserting property rights, yet his resentment is jealousy. Let's have your comment on this illustration.

James F. Morton Jr. San Francisco, Calif.:—Sometime ago it was announced in Lucifer that for those desiring a long-term subscription, $3 would be taken for a five years' term. I enclose herewith this amount. Please let the term begin far enough back to include all arrears up to date, and send me all issues in stock since Jan 1 of the present year. I have received only eight numbers of the Light-Bearer Library. Please send me whatever others have been issued. If the Library is continued beyond the year for which I have already subscribed, I shall renew my subscription promptly. Remember that I belong to the Lucifer family as long as I and Lucifer both live, although sometimes a pressure of other affairs causes you to hear seldom from me.

Mrs. J. Van Der Cammen, Tenn.:—I enclose $3.75 for which apply one dollar on subscription to Lucifer. For the remaining amount send me Dr. Foote's "New Book", also "The Bar Sinister and Licit Love," "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs" by Oswald Dawson and "Songs of the Unblind Cupid" by J. Wm. Lloyd. I will renew subscription to Library later, also send for your Autobiography. I distributed the leaflets sent me some time ago, but there is a scarcity of money among those I have acquaintance with. They are unable to subscribe. I have been circulating my old Lucifers among them, which have been very satisfactory in giving them light on subjects of which they were very ignorant. In regard to your proposition for trial trips would say that I can send one dollar about June to help.

W. M., New Haven, Conn.:—The last Lucifer I received had a blue mark on your article entitled "A Word to Our Workers—Old and New." I read that article thoroughly and in response to it will enclose herein twenty cents in postage stamps, with two names, to whom you can send Lucifer ten weeks. The persons whose names I am sending you are well able to take the paper and pay for it. Perhaps the ten weeks trial will determine whether they want it or not. Heretofore, whenever I have sent you any names for trial subscribers, they have been the names of persons who were not able to take the paper, and pay for it. That kind of friend appeals to me more than the kind who can pay; hence I used to pay for them, but probably when their trial subscriptions ran out, that was the end of it, consequently, there was no advantage to you, and the principal object of the trial subscription was lost. If you insert this letter in the paper do not print my name nor the names of the trial subscribers. This is not said from any disrespect to you or your paper. If I had not liked you and Lucifer I should not have clung to you and it for fifteen years. But I have had many an altercation with my friends while trying to champion the cause of Lucifer, consequently I do not come out now in more open warfare.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

'The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages, 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul. "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth. $1.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. By E. C. Walker. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"A WOMAN in order to live the purest life, must be FREE, must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially."—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD," by Henry Olerich. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 4 0 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy Price $1. For sale at this office.

Freethought Ideal, Edited by Etta Semple, is published fort-nightly at Ottawa, Kansas. It is the only atheistic paper in the world edited and published by a woman. Fifty cents per year. amples free.

Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness who addresses humanity.—From the Preface.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gliders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

By Grant Allen. "The Old Asceticism said: 'Be Virtuous and You Will Be Happy.' The New Hedonism says: 'Be Happy and You Will Be Virtuous." This is the key note of Grant Allen's Masterpiece. 30 large pages, five cents For sale at this office.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., No. 14. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, APRIL 20, E. M. 301. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE No. 861

The Perversion of a Pithy Phrase.

BY E. C. WALKER.

Mr. C. L. James, who invented the phrase, "The Movement in Favor of Ignorance," is now doing all he can to associate it with practices that can not be justified on any ground but that of ignorance of facts. In "Free Society," Lucifer, and other progressive papers he is doing his worst to defend the lost causes of vaccination and vivisection. The old gentleman, who undoubtedly means well and who knows a great deal about the distant past, evidently is taking at their face value the pretentious claims of modern dogmatists, instead of examining them critically and thoroughly. He is accusing Mr. A. B. Clarkson and others of ignorance of "doctordom," seemingly oblivious to the fact that their position and the position of the anti-vaccinationists is amply sustained by many members of the medical profession, among them some of the most prominent practitioners. In fact, the rapidly-growing movement against the interested ignorance regarding vaccination is in initiative and largely in following a doctors' movement.

The atrocity of vivisection is equalled only by the absurdity of the sweeping claims made for it by those who never protest against pain until they themselves suffer. The Inquisitors long ago discovered that water falling drop by drop on one spot on a body would cause the most agonizing pain. What, then, is added to the sum of human knowledge when the physiological laboratory of a great university subjects a horse to this torture? Does Mr. James answer that thereby the young men learn how to treat the human victim? But where is the human victim of this kind of torture? The religious inquisition has gone out of business and no civilized state dares thus torment the offenders it holds in its prisons. Where does the "movement in favor of ignorance" come in when we protest against such gratuitous and needless cruelties? The inquisition also slowly burned multitudes of men and women to death, but because the religious successors of the men who did this now protest against the slow roasting in ovens in the alleged interest of science of multitudes of animals other than men and women, shall we admit credulously that the science of curative medicine is the gainer by this abomination? Of course we have nothing to do with the attitude of the Pope in this matter; we are to use our own powers of observation and our own reasoning faculties regardless of his position, and Mr. James talks futilely when he essays to prejudice Freethinkers against the cause of humanity merely because a Pope favors it for the nonce. So much the better for this particular Pope, and so much the worse for the Freethinker who is fooled into antagonizing sympathy just because a Pope chances to champion it.

The sacrifice of "obsolete" animals goes on, yet if the claims made for vivisection were worth the paper upon which they were printed the "necessity" for the slaughter nearly would have ceased, we should have acquired by the tormenting already done a fund of medical knowledge sufficient to safeguard us against almost all forms of disease, but so far are we from the immunity that vivisection is claimed to give that the vivisectors are constantly clamoring for greater freedom and opportunity to use the knife and caustic. They keep right on torturing to discover facts that must have been discovered by torture long years ago, a million times over, if torture does a thousandth part of the good it is asserted it does.

Mr. James instances the old-time opposition of the church to the dissection of dead bodies. From this he reasons that the humanitarian's opposition to vivisection is as ill-founded as was the opposition of the church to the dissection of the bodies of the dead. And Mr. James calls himself a logician! Why did the church oppose dissection? Because she taught the doctrine of the immortality of man, of an undying soul, of bodily resurrection. Her doctors reasoned that dissection would interefere with this resurrection, just as her doctors now reason that cremation will interfere with it—of course I mean doctors of divinity. From her point of view, I submit her contention was not unreasonable. We laugh at her for this opposition to dissection and cremation, but that is because the facts she saw do not exist for us; we no longer believe in bodily resurrection, and even if we did we should see that there would be as little difficulty for a god of infinite power to gather together the fragments of a dissected or a cremated body as there would be for him to lift up a body buried in one place. We know more about the universe than did the old theologians. We have disposed of the facts upon which the church based her contention. On the contrary, have the vivisectors disposed of the facts upon which anti-vivisectionists oppose that most cruel practice? If they have not—as they have not—why drag in the opposition of the church to dissection? Where is the analogy between an operation upon a non-sentient body and an operation upon a sentient body? Mr. James knows there is none. The vivisectors have not proved that animals do not suffer intensely under vivisection; they have not proved that there is a compensating benefit to mankind. They have not disposed of the momentous fact that hundreds of thousands of young men and women can not witness and take part in the deliberate infliction of pain without its demoralizing very many of them, without its making nearly all of them less sensitive to the sufferings of others than are those who have not been subjected to this terrible training.

But we have not yet come to the end of this dissection illustration. Why have not the doctors and physiologists confined themselves to the bodies of the dead? Because they can not, they say, get so much knowledge by cutting up a dead body as they can by torturing the living. Their knowledge, they aver in so many words, comes out of suffering. From this admission we may estimate the value of their protestations—when cornered—that most vivisecting is done when the victims are under the influence of anæsthetics. The more suffering, the more knowledge—that is the theory. Who believes they do not act on the theory whenever they can?

But come with me a step farther, Mr. James. Living animals being better for experimental purposes than dead men and women and children, does it not follow that live men and women and children would be better for those purposes than are live animals of lower classes? Undoubtedly. Doctors are to treat men and women and children, and how can they most readily acquire knowledge that will be useful—by torturing guinea pigs and cats and dogs and horses and rabbits or by torturing men and women and children? The answer is unescapable, and there are physiologists who do not attempt to escape it, who venture to argue that it would be a long step in advance if the incurable, the deformed, the hopelessly indigent, the criminal of the human species, could be substituted for the unsatisfactory subjects furnished by other species and families. Granting the validity of the arguments of Mr. James, granting that vivisection, per se, is justifiable and productive of great good to the race, we are remorselessly driven to the conclusion reached by the frank physiologists just mentioned. And I have no doubt Mr. James, devoted to the cause of enlightenment and looking upon the opponents of human vivisection as defenders of the "movement in favor of ignorance," will be found favoring this logical extension of the gentle system. As an apostle of the good old church doctrine of infinite gain through suffering and sacrifice, he will, I am sure, offer himself upon the altar of vivisection for the benefit of his kind. A prolonged "examination" of Mr. James in the laboratory would be certain to reveal some chunks of wonderful knowledge to the painstaking and kindly gentlemen who manipulate the instruments of the modern Inquisition. The vivisector who understands his business could get more facts that would be of service to our race by such a "study" of the brain of Mr. James than he could by the like study of the brains of a million rabbits or cats.

Pain distorts and crazes. If you wish to know what is good for human beings, what will soonest bring them back from sickness to health, discover the conditions that prevail when they are well, and then restore those conditions. That is the method of the wise and successful physician. Vivisection is only one of the schemes invented by blindly-groping men to get around the effects of abnormal environments. It is barbarian as well as barbarous, going on all fours with a thousand experiments that have had their day and are now waste lumber in the forgotten garrets of medicine and surgery.

A few years ago, Dr. Elmer Lee, of New York, chairman of the department of physiology of the American Medical Association, read a paper before that body on "The Genesis of Disease." Recently he repeated this as a lecture before the Manhattan Liberal Club. A printed copy thereof lies at my hand as I write, and I make a few excerpts pertinent to this discussion:

". . . So long as medicine is regarded as an empiric art which is dependent upon the validity of cumulative experiments upon animals, even though performed by 'competent experimenters,' there is not any great hope of agreement among physicians. . . . Great attention at this day is given to biological laboratory experiments. Many of the experiments are without scientific importance, while a very large number are little more than fanciful and curious. Few of the animal experiments have any practical application." Italics are mine. Again:

"Bodily health is to be obtained by temperance, purity, cleanliness, fresh air, a contented and cheerful spirit, not by inoculating toxic poisons into our veins, or from the secrets to be dug out of the brains and entrails of tortured brutes. Nor after a century of vivisection, in which millions of harmless creatures have perished, have the experimenters given us a remedy for any of the woes and scourges of humanity. The death-rate of consumption was not lowered by the famous tuberculin discovery, nor that from hydrophobia by the Pasteur treatment, nor that from cholera by the inoculations by laboratory savants. The claim for antitoxins is ephemeral and disputed, and but for the favorable sentiment created by newspaper exaggerations and commercial methods its use would be seldom employed. There are many observers to these facts, but comparatively few who find the opportunity to speak of them or who have the privilege of speaking the truth to the world."

These remarks regarding vivisection and antitoxins are merely incidental in the paper of Doctor Lee, but the reasons he gives for his general position on the subject of disease, while most lucid and forceful, are too long to quote at this time. Mr. Clarkson, against whom Mr. James so freely made the charge of ignorance, may console himself with the reflection that at least one very prominent physician shares his "ignorance."

Mr. James says the reason regular physicians want laws enacted against "irregulars" is the fatal character of the treatment given by the "quacks." The regulars wish to protect the people! Just about as the politico-economic "Protectionists" want to protect the laborers by the adoption of high tariff laws. But Professor Crede of Leipzig says that "If physicians were better versed" in hydrotherapy, massage, etc., "the field of operation of many quacks would be greatly curtailed." To which Dr. Charles B. Page of Boston adds: "That is to say, if we were as well informed as the empirics we would do as good work and drive them from the field; for the quack is tremendously handicapped in many ways." I could fill pages with like testimony from "regular" physicians.

Mr. Harman, commenting on the protest made by Mr. Clarkson, and declining to commit himself either for or against vivisection, said he would freely bare his own arm to the vivisector's knife "if convinced that human happiness and progress might be materially or permanently enhanced thereby." Passing uncommented the obvious fact that it is one thing to give the use of an arm for the possible service of the race and quite another to give one's life, as the victims of the vivisectors do, it must be pointed out that the voluntary sacrifice of an arm or of the whole body is not incompatible with the fundamental principles upon which the editor of Lucifer and all other libertarians are supposed to stand. As Rationalists and Anarchists, we have no condemnation for the suicide; his life is his own and he may end it when he feels that his burdens and sorrows are greater than its usefulness and joys. Whatever he does at his own cost is his to do, "rightfully," as we speak for the lack of a better term. But this is something totally different from vivisection, and to offer the possible sacrifice of one's own arm as an apparent defense of vivisection or as an analogy of it, is most misleading. Mr. Harman may give the products of his labor to this or that person or cause, but how can this be used to point a moral of any kind when the question is the forcible taking of the product of one man's toil to bestow it upon another man? The illustration, if it was intended for an illustration, does not illustrate. The action of Mr. Harman when he gives his arm for purpose of experimentation and the action of the vivisector when he forces the rabbit or the criminal to submit to vivisection are unlike and hence not comparable. It might as well be implied that the eager volunteering of one man to fight for the state is of like nature with the drafting for military service of a man to whom the whole business is repugnant. In the first instance, the man freely runs the risk of throwing away his life; in the second instance, he is compelled to run that risk, and if he is killed his blood is upon the heads of those who forced him into the ranks, while the first, if he perishes, is simply the victim of his own enthusiasm or his own folly. If Mr. James and Mr. Harman surrender their nerves and their lives into the keeping of the vivisectors, that is their affair; liberty has not been outraged, nor has wanton and terrible pain been inflicted upon creatures that have no conception of the reason for their immolation nor any wish to serve the cause of "human happiness and progress."

Farewell.

BY ALBINA L. WASHBURN.

Goody, goody! I'm going to heaven!

I read that "heaven is a place for those who have failed on earth;" and if I am not a failure there are no failures.

Just think of a woman starting out alone to abolish poverty, debt and unhappiness from the face of the earth with the insane idea that those she hoped to benefit would turn in and help!

Such a simple thing too. Strange they will not! You have only to help each other, "In honor preferring one another." Let the bosses and the bankers alone, use a cheap home-made money based on labor and its products (if you must use any), work reasonably but not drudge, be honest and happy.

And then all who have any surplus of goods or labor are to deposit it in any central place agreed upon—that is, you can deposit some kinds of goods—as food, clothing, books and produce, though other kinds you cannot, such as digging wells, making hay etc., you understand—that you can put on the bulletin board with the price (your own price) stated. And the price of the goods too must be plainly affixed by the owner. All this is so simple; and then, you know, each buys the things of the others and employs through the manager those who do different kinds of labor from their own, and its just a merry-go-round. Things come to light more desirable than anything in stores. Work is done with loving care as for a neighbor. The home-made bread is light, the cake is sweet, the eggs are fresh, the butter ditto, the mittens are honestly knit by our own folks —unknown dainties by inventive cooks appear, the cute little gowns and panties always fit "somebody's darling," the garden seeds and implements are just to hand in the spring, the home concerts call every body out, the singers are paid in the labor tender, their friends pay the same at the door, whispering jocoscosely to one another that the paper money is so much handier than carrying pumpkins under their arms to buy the tickets and —all goes merry as a marriage bell.

That is, it ought to, for what could be better and easier? No staying at home sulking "cause 'taters are so cheap," or labor so underpaid; all set their own price and money flows to represent all their values. The girls "deposit" their beautiful music or studied oratory along with the boys; the violinist accompanies and—but where was I? O yes! I'm going to heaven; for I'm a failure, and the whole thing's a failure. The scheme for the benefit of humanity will go to heaven too. Why? why, would you believe that people would hesitate to so advance their interests as to repudiate or even neglect a plan to rid themselves of mortgages, debt, interest, bosses, starvation, low wages and social and financial slavery? You wouldn't believe it? O, but you must! For, during the past fifteen years I, yes I, a lone woman have preached it and practised it and tried by precept and example to set up this little heaven on earth but, —its no use! They won't! Most of them admit it's "all right" —"a splendid theory;" "it's what we ought to have," but "the rich have got us by the throat," "its too soon"—"we're too poor"—and every excuse but the true one—want of courage!

And I—to practice what I preach—that's the unkindest cut of all. "A woman can do nothing without money." If I attempt to "swap" my industry or talent or furniture I no longer need for room-rent or food or fuel I'm a "dead beat." If I work willingly and cheerfully and lovingly for those who need me and are grateful—and take no banker's money, only the things I choose for my own or others' use, I'm a fool.

If I hold forth to the curious about the nature of money and the necessity of financial reform—"they'll take the hard cash every time," or, "I'm ready when the rest are, but people are too selfish," or, "you're a hundred years ahead of your time," or, "O what's the use of worrying! things'll work out all right; plenty of charity organizations to look after the poor," etc., etc.

Anon some kindred thinker who has looked beneath the bubbling surface and has detected the slow but mighty under current in human affairs, says thoughtfully—"Yes, I'll cut your hair for labor-tender—just's good's any money. I'll buy of our people vegetables or apples or anything to eat."

Again, a farmer says, "Yes, I'll take the barber vegetables once in a while for the labor-tender then pay it back to him for barbering; then we'll both feel better; getting fair prices, no competition." Or, a woman says, "Yes, plenty of good Jersey milk at seven cents a quart. I'll get my children some clothes and school books and my daughter some of that nice sheet music," and—even away down in Massachusetts a faithful disciple sends wool and needles to the fancy knitters and lo! a lovely, fleecy shawl finds its way back east to the one who has sent gloves, veils, games for the young, and stamped patterns for the embroiderer. Yes, oh! it is so encouraging to have them say to me, "There's no hurry"—"you are doing a good work. Those photos of Colorado scenes were so interesting; can you send some more? how would you like some knit lace in return?" "I have some lots of ground and want to set out all kinds of bushes. Could you send me some of the wild plum from Colorado in the spring?"

But when all's said the bucket of co-operative exchange has but few drops in it yet—so, as my clothes are getting shabby and I have no home on earth I am going to heaven! I'll take my pencil along and—O I forgot, that we will have everything convenient there. I'll send you a telepath message from there, unless, indeed, saint Peter will not take labor-tender at the gate!

"Determination of Sex."

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

I never read an interesting book but I want to share the pleasure.

I have just read "Schenk's Determination of Sex." To me it is intensely interesting. He has "hit the nail on the head," but he draws a contrary conclusion from the one which his facts show to me.

It is curious how a fact will prove a theory to one person, and just the reverse of it to another. I have found it to be this way with what is called spirit phenomena. The real occurrences seem to me to prove mind-reading and perhaps clairvoyance, but not a life beyond the grave, while to believers in spirit existences it proves a very different theory.

Now Schenk gives long lists of statistics showing what he calls the superiority of the male, whereas each one proves to me the superior sex of the female. He says Wall lays down the principle that in the intercourse of two quite young parents the male sex tends to predominate. If on the contrary the age of the man is distinctly greater than that of the woman, he insists on the excess of females amongst the new born. To me, the immaturity of the young parent would naturally produce inferior young (males). And the addition of maturer years in the man would add to the excess of females as the superior animal.

Bidder says "women who bear their first child between the age of twenty and twenty-one produce more girls than boys. The older the woman is at the time of her first parturition, the greater number of male births. An excess of male births will occur in the case of those who first give birth to children between the age of thirty and forty (Eckhardt).

Now at twenty and twenty-one a woman is in her prime, and so can give an excess of the superior sex (girls) while at thirty and forty (as a rule) they are getting old (sexually) and so give incomplete progeny.

Schenk says, "A sexually exhausted individual always has the advantage of propagating his own sex." Now I can't see where the advantage comes in. Nature works for the highest and best and if an exhausted male produces a majority of male progeny it certainly shows he is too weak to create the highest sex.

The Kropotkin Lecture.

We have been requested to say that the Central Music Hall lecture on "Anarchism" by Prince Peter Kropotkin, and for which many tickets have been sold, will be delivered next Sunday evening—April 21—at eight o'clock. The postponement having been caused by the temporary illness of the speaker. It is also announced that a farewell reception will be given the distinguished orator on the evening of Tuesday April 23 at Medina Hall, this city.

The Vivisection Controversy.

The leading and longest article in this week's Lucifer is by Edwin C. Walker, in reply to C. L. James on the vivisection question.

Both Mr. James and Mr. Walker belong to the positive school of thought. Both are very voluminous as writers. Both have done and are doing much to break the shackles of ignorance and superstition that bind and enslave the human mind. Their work as fearless champions of freedom and justice is beyond praise. When it comes to a question of methods, however, there is wide room for difference of opinion.

Though differing much in style of writing both are partial to the dogmatic method—the self-assertive, the aggressive, the pugnacious, the gladiatorial, not to say the arrogant, the dictatorial, the assumptive, the authoritative, the pedagogic method of discussion. Both, as I see them, are good-humored and genial in temper, notwithstanding the hard knocks they give and take. Like professional prize-fighters they probably strip for the combat with a broad smile on their faces.

These characteristics are so thoroughly ingrained, so much an essential part of the mental make-up of these two men that it is probably useless to try to induce them to change their tactics in argument. The only proper thing then, for an editor to do is to let them have their say in their own way, else shut them out altogether, and advise them to try some other publisher, else publish a paper of their own.

As before said, I regard the subject of vivisection as possessing sufficient importance to warrant giving it a place in Lucifer's columns, and yet not so nearly allied to our central work as to justify such monopoly of our limited space as Messrs. James and Walker would seem to require; and having now given to each side of the discussion what seems to me a fair hearing I think it time to bring it to a close—at leas for the present, with a few words from the chairman or "moderator" of the meeting.

If my old friend and co-editor Edwin C. Walker had quoted the entire paragraph, or even the major part thereof, when it pleased him to bring a few lines of mine into the discussion, I probably would have been content to let his personal criticism go for what it is worth, without reply. That our readers may judge fairly between us I here reproduce the brief comment upon the pungent remarks of our Canadian friend and helper, for many years, A. B. Clarkson:

> The above strongly worded protest is inserted for the same reason that the paragraph in defense of vivisection was published, namely, because Lucifer's platform is the freest of the free, giving to all subjects a fair hearing. It is scarcely true that "the inquisition of torture finds a prominent place in Lucifer." So far as I now recall, one correspondent only,—C. L. James—has defended vivisection as a justifiable method of extending the limits of human knowledge. Others have as freely condemned it. For myself, alone, I maintain that no act is, of itself, wrong, criminal or wicked. The intent and the probable result of any act should justify or condemn it. Whether, under this definition, vivisection is ever justifiable, is a question I prefer not to assert or to deny. I have a horror of the needless infliction of pain but would freely bare my own arm to the vivisector's knife if convinced that human happiness and progress might be materially or permanently enhanced thereby.

Had I anticipated the paternalistic chastisement just received from the former junior editor of Lucifer I might have averted it by a little amplication of a briefly-worded protest against what seemed a one-sided view of a much controverted question. I could have said—with equal truth and candor, that not only my arm, but my whole body, my life itself, would be freely offered as a sacrifice—either by a quick or lingering death, if I believed the greater good of the greater number required such sacrifice. This would be simply following the lead of Mother Nature, whose chief concern or main drive, seems to be race-preservation rather than the safety and perpetuity of the individual life.

As to the voluntary or compulsory element in the case: Before spending time and temper over that factor in the vivisection problem it seems to me we should come to some understanding as to the larger ethical question—Have brute beasts the same right to life, liberty and pursuit of happiness as have their more developed human brothers and sisters? Few of us hesitate to kill these undeveloped humans whenever our "convenience, health or safety" demand their death, and if we are justified in taking animal life at all—except when clearly in self-defense—it is certainly no great stretch of this assumption of superior right, to claim that the manner of their death is also a matter of discretion with us, a matter of subordination to our paramount right to life, liberty and pursuit of happiness.

If asked for my personal opinion I would frankly answer that it is altogether on the side of the anti-vivisectionists, as it is also on the side of the anti-vaccinationists, but it should be remembered that this is only a LAYMAN'S opinion, and therefore not of much value. To my thinking the fact that vivisection and vaccination are championed by that class of medical doctors who seek to secure a monopoly of the curative art, and who would thereby deprive all but themselves of the right to choose their own medical advisers, is a circumstance of tremendous significance.

For one I decidedly prefer a free field and no favors,—no privileges for any school of the healing art,—then let the fittest, or best, survive. We all remember the story—whether legend or fact does not count—of the silversmiths at Ephesus, and the words of their leader Demetrius: "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth." He argued that if the belief in a god that needed no images should become popular, "this our craft would be in danger," and the wealth of the craftsmen correspondingly decreased; therefore, down with competition! "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!"

The word "craft" has a sinister ring. It is hard to decide which of the three great crafts has done greater harm to mankind—Priestcraft, Kingcraft (including state-craft, law-craft, lawyer-craft) or Doctor-craft. But this does not mean that all priests and parsons are enemies of mankind, or that all doctors of law and of medicine are bad men. The fact that many of these are doing what they can to abolish the power of priest-craft, state-craft or lawyer-craft, and of medical doctor-craft, is one of the most hopeful signs of the times. M. H.

Dr Herron and Contract Marriage.

In another place is found some extracts from Max O'Rell, in which he calls the marriage contract a "devil." It now appears that the world-famous Dr. Herron holds the same opinion regarding conventional or institutional marriage. A late press dispatch from Grinnell, Iowa, the former home of Dr. Herron, says, "Mrs. E. D. Rand and her daughter Carrie E. Rand, have nearly completed their plans for leaving the city and removing to New York, where, it is said, Miss Rand will be married to Dr. Geo. D. Herron the noted Socialist."

Our readers have doubtless read that the former Mrs. Herron lately obtained a divorce from her husband, naming Miss Rand as "co-respondent." The closing paragraph of the press dispatch is in these words:

> The marriage will be the outcome of the causes that have led up to the social reformer's divorce from his wife a few weeks ago. Miss Rand is in sympathy with Dr. Herron's work. She is reputed to be worth almost $1,000,000. Dr. Herron is known to be opposed to the marriage contract. In his social ideal the marriage state is tyranny and the ceremony will be a concession to the other party.

Having listened to a number of lectures by this noted socialistic reformer I am by no means surprised that the marriage ceremony in this case will be a concession to the other party.

A very significant item in this press dispatch is the statement that the "judge who granted the Herron divorce refused to sign the decree until the check for $60,000 was in his hands."

No explanation is given as to what the $60,000 is for, but presumably it is the price to be paid by the Doctor to his late wife, in lieu of the support which she had been receiving from him, as his wife. As he himself probably had no money, this sum must be paid by others, and lest there should be default in payment the judge, as guardian of the interests of the divorced woman, refused to grant the decree that made Herron a free man until he had the check for the price of liberty in his hands.

Simply one more illustration of the old saw, "Matrimony is a matter of money." Under our present economic system there is no cause for surprise that it should be so. No cause of wonder that woman, the weaker, the more helpless partner to the contract, should want a record kept of the transaction by which she surrenders the ownership of her person, so that she can have a legal claim for support upon the man to whom she thus surrenders. Marriage Among the Doukhobors.

A friend has sent us the following clipping from the "Springfield (Mass.) Republican," from which it would appear that there is at least one religious sect in the world that practically ignores marriage laws. Says the "Republican:"

> The Doukhobor settlements in Canada have apparently been satisfactory neither to the religious Russian emigres nor to the Canadian government. The "Montreal Star" describes the Doukhobors as a very old-man-of-the sea, and suggests that the government, which, besides giving them free homesteads in the Canadian Northwest, spent considerable money in bringing them to Canada, would be willing to expend a little more to get rid of them. The Russians on the other hand, have issued a manifesto to the world, announcing that the Canadian laws are too oppressive to live under, and invitieg other nations to offer them a home. Complaint is voiced that the meekness and humility of the Doukhobors have not prevented them from taking a stubborn stand against the laws of the Dominion. The land laws first made trouble, but a greater difficulty was found in the Russians' ideas on marriage and divorce, which had practically no regulation at all. When the Canadian government finally made it clear that the laws would not be changed for their benefit, the Doukhobors decided to emigrate again, but, pending a grant by some more liberal country, asked the Dominion government for temporary leave to stay.

It might be interesting to know whether the "ideas" of these rebellious Russians permit and practicalize freedom in love and maternity. Will anyone who knows enlighten us? M. H.

Laws Cannot Reform.

A press dispatch from New York tells of an interview in that city with Carter H. Harrison—lately re-elected mayor of Chicago by a large majority—in which he was asked to give his opinion of the methods of municipal reform now being tried in New York. In his reply he took issue with both the amateur method, as represented by the New York "Society for the Suppression of Vice," and also with the more popular plan of suppression by statute law, or by municipal regulation. Here are a few of his ideas, as given by the reporter:

> You cannot reform any community by law. It must be done by education. . . . I think it very poor policy for a mayor or a newspaper to advocate the enforcement of blue laws or the ringing of the curfew bell when people are not in favor of them. . . . . The community cannot rise above its own level, and its level is reflected in the way it enforces its law.

Essence and Source of Religion.

> It is not that religion is merely useless; it is mischievous. It is mischievous by its idle terrors; it is mischievous by its false morality; it is mischievous by its hypocrisy, by its fanati-ism, by its dogmatism, by its threats, by its hopes, by its promises. Considered under its mildest and most amiable form, it is still mischievous, as inspiring false motives of action, as holding the human mind in bondage, and diverting the attention from things useful to things useless. The essence of religion is fear, and its source is ignorance.—Frances Wright.

Love is not a thing to be commanded, not a duty, not something to be forced. Nothing is more unfortunate than for any two to try to make themselves love where Nature says no.—"Dawn-Thought," by J. Wm. Lloyd.

To Be Happy in Matrimony Forget You Are Married.

So says Max O'Rell, in a recent syndicate article. A great drawback is, he says, that "devil of a contract which constantly reminds you that you are married to each other and prevents you from loving freely."

Max O'Rell is guilty of writing a great deal of twaddle; but often he tells the truth in a few short, striking sentences.

The twaddle is used as padding; and also, possibly, to prevent the naked truth shocking his conventional readers.

Here are a few noteworthy anecdotes which he tells:

"I extract the following lines from the evidence of a witness for the prosecution in a case that was recently tried in London. The witness is a most respectable old lady, whose house is situated next to that inhabited by the defendant.

"The counsel for the prosecution asks her if she ever heard quarrels going on in her neighbor's house.

"'No, sir,' she replies; 'I must say that the defendant and his wife always seemed to me to be very quiet people. I have never heard any noise; I have never heard them quarrel.'

"'Do you hold them to be respectable people?'

"'Well, sir, I don't know them. All I can say is that I have often watched them in their garden, and several times I have seen the defendant put his arms round his wife's waist and kiss her.'

"'You were shocked, I suppose.'

"'I thought they were behaving themselves very much like people that are not married.'

"Fancy thus scandalizing a neighbor, a most respectable old lady! Shocking!"

"This little scene is not typical of England; here is another one of the kind which is French and which I borrow from the recollections of my youth.

"The bell was one afternoon rung at our door. The maid servant, who happened to be in the hall at that moment, opened the door immediately, and just caught a charming man, friend of ours, and his wife in the act of having a delicious kiss. They evidently did not expect that the bell would be answered so quickly. However, as they had been married at least ten years, they ought to have known better, and I am ready to admit, even to proclaim, that their behavior was most improper. When she returned to the kitchen the maid hastened to remark to the cook: 'I say! you know Mr. and Mrs. So-and-So, who often call here? Well, I'll tell you, they ain't married.' And, to prove her assertion, she related what she had seen."

"I know a charming and most intelligent Englishman who enjoys life with his wife from Saturday to Monday. You may see them every week, merry as larks, on the parade at Brighton. Everybody at the hotel where they stay winks and is persuaded they are not married. They do not wave in the air their certificate of marriage. They are never one instant separated; they talk, and chat, and laugh, and look at each other with beaming eyes; they walk arm in arm and retire early. In a word, their behavior is deplorable; it is the behavior of people who have lost their moral senses; of people who are not married, as the old lady of the trial would exclaim, holding up her hands in horror."

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Susie M. Freet, Gailliam, Mo.:—We don't need any such paper as you publish, called the Lucifer; so the sooner you stop it the better. Tell the one who paid for it to go where it is hotter than this. "A word to the wise is sufficient."

Thomas Hayes, Phoenix, Ariz.:—Enclosed please find 25 cts. for a copy of "The Prodigal Daughter" and your Lucifer for thirteen weeks. How are you going to convert Christians to Freethought, when they don't even read the Bible, much less anything like Paine's "Age of Reason"?

R. C. C., Portland, Ore.:—Enclosed please find postage to send sample copies of Lucifer to the enclosed list of names. May it's bright rays never grow dim. It's numerous subscribers in Oregon believe it to be the most enlightening and progressive journal on earth. Your energetic efforts on behalf of humanity will be gratefully appreciated long after your defamers are rotting in their graves.

Myra Pepper, Box 394, Harper, Kansas:—Please give my love to all enquiring friends, and if there are any readers of Lucifer in Harper or vicinity I will be pleased to know them. Wish I could have your lecture on marriage &c. I think it ought to be printed in pamphlet and put in the reach of the people. I have no money now to send for leaflets but will distribute some if you will send them to me.

B. Wade Hewett, Seattle, Wash.:—Enclosed find postal money order for $3. I am in your debt for Lucifer to the amount of $1.88; for the other dollar please mail me at your earliest moment two copies of "Hilda's Home." I want to put these in the hands of friends to do missionary work. I go into the mountains mining in about two weeks, so kindly send me these books at once; for I want to place them before I go.

J. K. P. Baker, Harlan, Iowa:—Only yesterday I received samples of Lucifer. I have heard too much about the "Prodigal Son," and now I feel like taking "The Prodigal Daughter" to a place in my affections. Send on the "Baker's Dozen" of Light-Bearing Lucifers, and by way of penalty for this wretched old pun you may send me also "The Bar Sinister and Licit Love" and "Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses," by E. C. Walker. Mr. Walker is the most forcible, logical, consistent writer I have ever read.

Winnipeg Man, Canada.—By a mere chance I happened to see the paper Lucifer. After reading only a few lines I got anxious to be a subscriber, not only for the paper itself but for the Light-Bearer Library, and as I understood your "Combination Offer" both the magazine and the paper Lucifer for a whole year could be got for $1.25; you will find the amount enclosed with this letter. Later on I hope I shall be able to order Dr. Foote's new book "The Home Encyclopedia." You would make me glad to see as many of the "leaflets" and pamphlets of same principles as you can afford to send free.

Albert Denser, Pittsburg, Pa.:—I send you one dollar in response to your appeal to "Workers,—Old and New." Please allow me to suggest an idea. I think that if about ten such educational papers as Lucifer would club together and put one or more agents in the field, such agents to be sustained by contributions from the workers—then let these agents get face to face with every liberal and thinker in the country, and thus have a good solid talk. In this way I think some very solid results would be accomplished. At the same time these agents could take some sort of statistics. We ought to find out who is who and what is what.

How do you like the idea? In this way all our people would be reached personally, which is certainly much better than by literature only. By personal interviews something like an organization could be formed, making it much easier to practicalize Lucifer's views, than at present.

B. A., Adelaide, S. Australia:—Your paper is beyond all praise. It brings a breath of Freedom that is most inspiring and elevating always; the subjects with which it deals are treated so broadly, so effectively and yet so delicately as well as thoroughly. The numbers of the Light-Bearer Library came to hand all right, and I think I can sell these little safety matches! Enclosed find five shillings. Please send me two copies of "New Hedonism;" the rest of the money apply on any debt I may owe to you. Wish I could do more to help you in the cause to which you have devoted your life. You are most generous, but you must not allow me unconsciously to impose upon your goodness.

Combination Offers.

LIGHT-BEARER LIBRARY—Monthly magazine, forty-eight pages each, price of twelve numbers (nine of which are now ready) fifty cents—and Lucifer one year of fifty-two numbers, price one dollar, will both be sent to new subscribers for one dollar and twenty-five cents. Single copies of the magazine will be sent for five cents; sample copies of Lucifer free.

LIFE HISTORY of Moses Harman (in preparation)—four hundred pages, bound in cloth with portrait, price one dollar (sample pages of which book will be sent on application), and Lucifer, one year of fifty-two numbers, price one dollar, will both be sent to all new subscribers for one dollar and fifty cents

LUCIFER FIFTY CENTS PER YEAR.

To meet the universal demand for CHEAPNESS in literature we now offer Lucifer one year, of fifty-two numbers, for fifty cents to new subscribers in clubs of five or more; or five years ahead to one subscriber, whether old or new, for two dollars and fifty cents. Will not our "Committee of Ways and Means,"—which committee includes all our helpful co-operators everywhere, make a note of this and act accordingly? We send out many hundreds of samples free, every week, and from this lavish sowing of seed-thoughts we reap a small harvest of subscribers. Will not our friends whose work and that of Lucifer are one and the same, put forth a little effort to secure yearly subscribers, as well as trial subscribers, to these winged seed-sowers?

LIGHT-BEARER LIBRARY NO. TEN.

of New Series, (now in preparation) contains "Marriage—an address delivered by Juliet H. Severance at the International Congress of Freethinkers, in Chicago, October 4 1893." Price of single copy five cents. Price of the Library, per year of twelve numbers, fifty cents.

Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness who addresses humanity.—From the Preface.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeannette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

WANTED: A SWEETHEART! I have a correspondent who desires a business partner, an intelligent companion, and a sweetheart, all in one. Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lilian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers; 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul. "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters. Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents. Cloth bound $1.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth. $1.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form By E. C. Walker. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"A WOMAN in order to live the purest life, must be must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the FREE, love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially."—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD." by Henry Olerich Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 4 0 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy Price $1. For sale at this office.

THE SANCTITY OF MARRIAGE, As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint: A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution, its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work, Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents; for sale at this office.

WHAT SHALL WE DO

To be saved from the unjust conditions in which ignorant and foolish legislation has placed the mothers of the race? And we must be saved, for—

"No nation, wise, noble and brave,
Ever sprang though the father had freedom,
From the mother, a slave"

We must read, think, act. . . . Read "HILDA'S HOME: A Story of Woman's Emancipation." Price, 50 cents. 426 pages. With each order for this book we will send LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER, free, for Thirteen Weeks. "Hear all sides—then decide." Address

M. HARMAN, 500 Fulton Street, Chicago, Ill.

Law and Love.

I gave to Law a task to do—
A morning journeying to take—
And whispered softly. "For my sake!"
As sadly from his playmates he withdrew.

Across his features fell the shade,
And with no parting kiss he went;
I stood and saw his discontent,
Stood saddened, yet he had not disobeyed.

I gave to Love a task to do—
A far off journey in the night;
Her upturned face grew strangely bright,
Her parted lips smiled back—"Oh yes, for you!"

Not even did her singing cease,
As quickly she rose up from play,
And with a soft kiss sped away,
And left my eyes all tears—my heart all peace.

What Woman Will Wrest from the New Century.

BY LAURA H. EARLE.

The first question for a woman to decide, in discussing her own sex and its ideals, is how far she shall be honest. This word, which causes a smile when it is used in connection with woman, I take by design, and of set purpose. It is one of the signs of the time we live in, that this good, plain old word has been perverted from its real meaning, that it has only a narrow and special significance when applied to the sex that has forgotten to be frank and true. There are two great qualities that I wish woman might seize for herself from the glorious new time; of which the first is Honesty—the habit of being honest; the second Courage; and with these two traits added to her what more could woman ask of any century?

It is in considering the application of these traits to woman's action, that difficulty in being perfectly frank is felt. Nevertheless, I shall try it and shall cite a few of the cases where we seem particularly to need courage and honesty. I shall hope, at least in part, to throw off the race tendency to evasion of the truth in certain matters.

No fact is trifling in such an analysis as this, so that a woman's willingness to give up her own name when she associates her life with that of a man, and to become known to the world as bel ongingto him, has this importance, that it suggests that she give up her own set of habits, more or less, her own intimacies, her own thoughts and opinions: and if she is honest with herself she cannot give these up.

Why does she become Mrs. when she was Miss? Has she not the courage to remain true to her name?

Another apparently trifling matter there is that has a deep significance: a woman's timidity if a man—a stranger—speaks to her in the street or any public place: sometimes even if a woman accosts her. Supposing a man does speak to her. What is there to cause fear? She is not compelled to answer—not even to the extent of being polite. Though I really do not see why she should not be civil at all times. We must think, in all this talk of fear in such cases, that there is some affectation. It cannot be that a woman honestly thinks that the tribute a man pays her in wishing her attention is a danger to her.

Through myself and others I have learned that women physicians, when treating women, go on rules made altogether by men; not through their own experience making new laws for their own practice. Their courage, it seems to me, should go the length of making them perfectly fearless in upsetting old and prejudiced theories, deduced from superficially observed, or imperfectly understood, phenomena. This I would say for all the sciences: let women observe, in a scientific spirit, all that closely affects them, and draw their own conclusions therefrom, not accepting as final those conclusions which have been arrived at by the intellectual processes of one sex working alone.

I find that women still make something of a fetish of self-sacrifice: a thing which the Christian doctrine tends to exalt into a virtue. And this virtue society has been accustomed to regard as particularly beautiful in woman. The cultivation of self-sacrifice for its own sake cannot have a strengthening effect on character; and woman must gain strength of character before she can be brave. Of course that sacrifice of personal desires and comforts made in the devotion to a high purpose, is one of the noblest manifestations of human character; although the step from this to fanaticism is a very short one.

At a regular meeting of one of our literary societies, not long since, love was the subject of discussion for the evening. Now whether it is possible in human nature to speak the truth on this subject I do not know; whether a man, any more than a woman, will be honest in affairs of love, seems doubtful. But what happened on this notable occasion was that two ladies, well known to literature of the polite kind, having accepted long beforehand to speak on this subject, got up and declared, in cold blood, and at length, that they really could not talk about love—one of them, I believe, on the ground that, as it is one of those things nearest our hearts, so it is most difficult for us to mention it. Of all improprieties, I might say indecencies, commend me to the suggestion that there is anything improper in love. But it is nevertheless true that among women generally there is a feeling that the passion between the sexes is improper. Most women will deny love unless he comes with a certificate and a mayor's signature. Here a woman dares be neither brave nor honest. What woman, wanting a child, dares say so? What woman, wanting a lover, dares say so? And yet is it anything but honest and right for her to desire both? What a pity it is that she cannot be simply and honestly herself in this. But instead, she must concentrate her energies on being fascinating, so as to seduce the law, in the shape of marriage. In this process love is much lost sight of. Indeed, what with proprietary rights given by marriage, which bring with them fear and jealousy; what with the question of pecuniary support—woman can scarcely know what love is. When woman can be without fear that her passion will betray her to an accusing public, which will strip her of means of getting a livelihood as well as of reputation merely because she loved; when she can be sure of being safe in her love, whatever the circumstances of its manifestations, and totally without regard to anybody's law but her own, then will woman first love man in a way that is worthy of them both. Then both kinds of prostitution—that which claims sanctity under the cloak of marriage, and that kind which has always had society's secret encouragement along with its public condemnation—will cease.

Can the century do such things for woman? Or will she seize them for herself? What will man do to help her? —Conservator.

Why Is This Thus?

BY JAMBLICHUS.

Whoever can be surprised at any inconsistencies of Christian character or conduct will encounter an uninterrupted series of surprises all his life long. I have fairly well overcome any tendency to surprise at the constantly recurring absurdities of those who profess "the faith once delivered to the saints" but I must confess to being a little jarred when I read in "The Churchman" of April 13th. 1901, on page 461, a review, or reading notice of a new edition of Balzac, "now for the first time completely translated into English from the 'Edition Definitive'," comprising the 'Contes Drolatiques.' I quote with pleasure the opening paragraph of this review as follows:

"No fact in the literary history of our decade is more encouraging to those who are watching the development of sound literary taste in America than the steady progress of the fame of Balzac. Fifteen years ago current American opinion would have excused its ignorance under an affected regard for the proprieties. Today three translations make their separate appeals to the American purchaser. All who pretend to an interest in fiction know something of Balzac, and all who know something want to know more, and to be brought into as close touch with him as is possible across the gulf of a foreign language and of two generations."

Now if there ever was a book that Comstock and his gang more pertinaciously insisted upon characterizing as obscene than any other book, that book was Balzac's "Contes Drolatiques." Indeed, if I remember correctly, judges have been found upon occasion, as destitute of moral principle as Comstock himself, who have upheld the pretense that "Contes Drolatique" was an obscene book, to the annoyance and pecuniary loss of honest booksellers. So that if Comstockism means anything, and if judicial decisions have any value then certainly "The Churchman" has violated the law by giving information "where, how or of whom or by what means" this obscene book may be obtained. It is likely that under the Russianizing influences of our present bureaucratic government "The Churchman" will no more be prosecuted for giving such information than was the editor of the "Church Union" for the lottery advertisement she published. Such prosecutions are reserved for the editors of little struggling papers with limited means and circulation who advocate advanced ideas; fellows who can't defend themselves. These are victims of the blackmail law. No editor of a church paper runs any risk of prosecution on such a pretense. I remember that the president of the Vice Society himself once circulated an advertisement of the same general character as one for publishing which a victim of the law was fined $2,000 by a corrupt judge, yet the president of the Vice Society was never molested. And a deluded people talk about the impartial administration of justice.

I am not saying that "Contes Drolatiques" is an obscene book. I do not think it is. Indeed I do not know what an obscene book is at all. I never saw one. I simply say and I want to emphasize the fact that while poor booksellers have been threatened and molested and harassed under the silly pretense that this book is obscene, "The Churchman" has made no protest against all this fake business of pretending to suppress obscenity, and now does the very thing which lays it liable, under an infamous law, to the same molestation and outrage which the poor booksellers suffered. I only wish "The Churchman" had had moral character enough behind it to say the right thing about Balzac at a time when so doing might have had the merit of enlightening the public and of rebuking an unjustifiable attack upon some poor weak publisher, and I wish "The Churchman" had today strength of character to protest with vigor against Comstockian deviltry in general.

Sayings.

BY FRANCIS BARRY.

The woman of the future will be self-owned. Her bed-room will be her castle; its keys will be given into her life-long keeping; she shall open and no man shut, and shut and no man open.

There is no higher law, in the heavens above, or on the earth beneath, for the regulation of woman's conduct, than woman's own nature.

The manly man will be negative to the woman, or women, he loves, and positive to all other women.

No manly man will ever enter a woman's bed-room without being bidden, by word, look, or touch; and when bidden she shall be safe from any manifestation she does not by word, look, or touch invite.

The only right of woman about which it is not mockery and nonsense to talk, is the right to herself, and that so-called "Woman's Rights Movement" which denies to woman absolute freedom in the sphere of love and maternity, is a folly and a fraud.

The genuine kiss is sacred to love; the woman capable of refined and elevated life, who kisses women, or men, promiscuously, is a prostitute.

The man who attempts to kiss a woman without first knowing that she wants his kiss, is a blackguard; and the man who accepts a kiss he does not want, is an ass.

Any man has a right to make any avowal to any living woman, (if she is not married) and if she is sensible and womanly she will not be offended; but after his avowal he had better be silent, leaving her to render a silent negative, or an affirmative response in her own time and way.

Any woman, or girl, on the face of the earth, black or white, charming or ugly, pure or vile, may make any advance, or proposition to me, and unless she desires the fact known, and makes the disclosure, her secret shall be as safe with me as though chained to a mill-stone, and cast into the deepest sea.

The wise man will learn more of a fool than a fool will of a wise man.

If I cannot have what I want it is because the ruling influences decide it is not good enough for me.

The greatest human achievement is to get into rapport with the currents of the Universe.

I believe in the Universe, and all there is in it, and in its remaining just as it is, for one instant, but not in its remaining as it is for another instant; and it will not—so I have my own way.

The man does the most good who excites the most thought; and for this purpose error is useful as well as truth.

Press Writers and Press Workers.

BY FRANCIS B. LIVESEY.

1. The several persons enquiring about the Press-Writers should be reminded that free thought, free speech, free press and free mails is the motto of the Writers, to which all must subscribe who join. The next requisite in order is a willingness to circulate the literature of friend and foe to facilitate public discussion. All, from Catholic to Freethinker, can then join.

2. Edward Stern, 4244 Chestnut St., Phila: You are right in the idea that Carnegie should be worked upon by the Press-Writers and urged to establish a large people's paper. No subject so much demands Press-Writers' attention. I have been at it for sometime and a number of papers have seconded me. The Louisville "Courier-Journal" says Carnegie has the idea in his head. Almost any paper will take a letter on this subject. Let the Writers apply themselves.

3. Boston Anarchist: It is very true that in Prof. George D. Herron's "Social Crusader" many sentences could be picked out that would pass for Anarchistic mottoes. But he don't mean them that way. In the same way he has for years given utterance to my views on Christianity. I have time and again probed him, with no result. The "Social Gospel," of South Jamesport, New York, lately led me to believe it surely meant its utterances, but a test letter I sent it was returned with levity. I have lived the Christianity of the Christian Socialist, but he is, practically, as ignorant of his own profession as the average clergyman. However, Herron and all other reformers are stirring things up, and for that reason it is best that we have no special fight among ourselves until the common enemy is crushed.

4. Mabel Gifford, Needham, Mass: Your article on divorce in "Pennsylvania Grit" of April 7 was fine. More liberty and an education through the press, are truly, what is needed. I am glad to see that there are Christians who can teach some Freethinkers freedom. It is a mistake to suppose that we all live amid bats and owls in caves.

5. "Pennsylvania Grit" is a Sunday weekly, published at Williamsport, Pa. $2.00. Circulation 110.000. It gives articles of 450 words; some six or eight a week, and gives first, second and third prizes to all articles appearing. The prizes are books, ranging in value from perhaps $3.00 down. Bro. Groh and many Press-Writers have appeared in this paper. I have myself captured all the prizes; but I would prefer to see the prizes dropped and a whole page given to the People's Forum. As the paper goes all over the world, it is a good medium.

6. J. T. Small, Provincetown, Mass: I have noted in "Boston Post" and other large papers your recent letters against vaccination. What you have accomplished in your own town, state and elsewhere in this cause, is remarkable. It is just simply a proof of the power of the Press-Writer. The Anti-Vaccinationists, with their organ, "Vaccination," at Terre Haute, Indiana, ought to get a Press-Writer's move on them.

7. A number of Press-Writers have availed themselves of Bro. Stern's kindness and gotten in large Philadelphia papers. He especially watches the "Evening Bulletin" (127,000) and the "Evening Telegraph" (98.000), one cent each. The former takes 250 word letters and the latter up to 600, on live topics only. It is almost impossible to get the big city dailies to send copies of their papers with the Press-Writer's letters. Hence, the men like Bro. Stern are blessings. Bro. Beattie is good for the "Chicago Tribune," and Bro. Wheeler for the "Record-Herald." I am good for the "Baltimore Sun" and "World." We want a man of this kind in Cincinnati and another in St. Louis —in fact, anywhere.

8. The Cincinnati "Weekly Enquirer" is a paper with an immense circulation. It costs a dollar or so to join its Household Club, when one can write freely for that page. Frank Reed, of Eureka, Calif., one of Lucifer's correspondents, appears there, as do many other Freethinkers. I have been there myself. All subjects are discussed in article form. The paper is seventy-five cents a year.

9. Rev. B. M. Adams, Bethel, Conn., has declared in conference that Methodist mothers are keeping their daughters out of the church because they cannot make good matrimonial alliances if they embrace Methodism. The old saying has been that to attain anything one had to join the church. It is a big step in reform to see the reverse. We should write our congratulations to Rev. Adams or express ourselves through his local paper, the "Evening Post," of Bridgeport. The "Baltimore World" of April 11th published him.

10. Rev. Jacob Schlegel, of New York City, is sorry that he has married 3,000 couples. He thinks he has thereby been active in promoting the unhappiness of 6.000 people. Exactly, Mr. Schlegel; step down and out from the occupation of the minister and enjoin all your brother ministers to do the same. Then think it over a little further and you will find that your burials, your baptisms and your preachings of the "word of God" generally, is not calculated to improve or make happy the human family. Come along, and let us publish you as the first one to abdicate on conscientious grounds. For his encouragement, the Writers should drop him a line. The "Baltimore Sun" gave him a long editorial on April 11th.

Charles D. McBride, Samoth, Ill: You are utterly wrong in trying to make it appear through the press that I want to foist the Bible and Christ upon Freethinkers. Conscience is all that I preach to Freethinkers. Before his death Ingersoll said we wanted "more Conscience." He called it one of the six greatest needs of the time. Go ahead with your press writing and stop trying to raise false issues.

Who Are Infidels?

BY S. R. SHEPHERD.

The word Infidel should be discarded and allowed to become obsolete. It misleads and confuses. To illustrate: Twenty-five years ago I lived in Troy, Kansas. The new pastor of the Methodist church, Rev. John Cook, called on me. Finding him broad and evoluted I accepted his invitation to hear him preach.

Later he invited me to a seat in the choir. Allowing no one to outdo me in fraternal courtesy I complied. Later on I heard that a "sister" whose husband had "done time" in the Joliet, Ill., pen. for horse stealing had organized a select circle of saints who refused to attend church as long as "that Infidel sang in the choir."

I sought the pastor and tendered my resignation, saying I could not for one moment entertain the idea of keeping any of the lambs from the fold. He vehemently demurred, declaring that he would stay with me and fight it out on that line if it took all summer. But I was obdurate.

The next Sunday he brought the matter up and preached the pious frauds such a sermon of righteous rebuke as might have been inspired by the great Galilean hater of Pharisaical hypocrisy and external, pinchback piety. He told them that the honest disbeliever who lived true to his convictions was not an infidel at all, but that they were the real infidels themselves, inasmuch as they were unfaithful to the example and teachings of him whose religion they professed, whose gospel they accepted and whose name they bore, and yet whom they cruelly dishonored, denied and crucified in their daily lives and conduct.

Lesson: The lower men are in the scale of development the more they differ, wrangle and dispute. On the higher planes of unfoldment all differences disappear and love unites them in the bonds of a common brotherhood.

Rev. Ben. Deering, the evangelist, in one of his sermons said: "Down in Kentucky, where I come from, stockmen spend heaps of money and lots of study and labor trying to breed fine stock, and it is no unusual thing for a man to sell a bull for $25,000. At the same time he overlooks the same principle of improving his own species and raises a twenty-five cent dude to disgrace his good name."

The Kropotkin Lecture.

The lecture of Peter Kropotkin, the Russian exile, commonly called Prince Kropotkin, at Central Music Hall, Sunday evening, April 21, was a gratifying success, notwithstanding the very unfavorable weather. The "Chicago American's" report opens thus:

"We do not exile our patriots; we hang them," was the startling opening sentence of Prince Kropotkin's lecture on "Anarchism and Its Philosophy" before 3,000 well dressed people at Central Music Hall last night. He was speaking of the United States, and not his native Russia, when he used the possessive pronoun, and the few professed Anarchists in the audience applauded what they took as a tribute to the men who paid the price on the gallows of their participation in the Haymarket riot.

This paragraph is interesting for several reasons:

First, as showing that the big Chicago dailies no longer ignore the fact that Anarchistic lectures in Chicago call out large audiences of "well-dressed people." The time was when Anarchistic and Socialistic meetings were almost invariably "associated with unkempt beards, rough clothes and stale tobacco smoke"—to quote the "American's" own words.

Second. The proverbial inaccuracy of the average newspaper man as to matters of fact receives another illustration when it is known that it was Clarence Darrow, the chairman of the evening, not Kropotkin, who said, "we do not exile our patriots," etc.

Third. More important still is the painfully apparent fact that the great dailies dare not yet, after a lapse of more than a dozen years, tell the truth about the ever memorable Haymarket affair. They still persist in the statement that Parsons, Spies, Engel and Fisher, "paid the price on the gallows for their participation in the Haymarket riot."

Not until the real criminals—the judges, the jurymen and other officials, also the capitalists who paid the jurymen and others who participated in the judicial murder, also the editors and reporters who helped to deceive the public as to the real facts, also the ministers of the gospel who held up the accused men to their audiences as "atheists," "heaven-defying infidels," "rebels against God and man;" the politicians, lawyers, leading merchants and tradesmen generally—not till all these are DEAD and in a fair way to be FORGOTTEN, can we expect the big Chicago dailies to tell the simple truth about the "Haymarket riot."

Till then it will never do for these dailies to acknowledge what the facts, as brought out at the trial, most clearly proved, that Fielding told the truth when he said, "We are peaceable," and that the rioters were none other than Captain Bonfield and his squad of policemen.

Till then it will be good financial policy for the publishers of the great Chicago dailies to iterate and perpetuate the monumental falsehood that now confronts the citizens and visitors to the city whenever they take a walk in Union Park. At the southeast entrance to that park stands a monument in bronze and granite, representing a policeman standing with uplifted arm and uttering these words:

"In the name of the people of Illinois I command peace."

On one side of the monument in large letters are these words:

"Dedicated by Chicago, May 4, 1889, to her Defenders in the Riot of May 4, 1886."

When the people of Chicago shall have recovered from the unheard-of scare by which they completely lost their heads for the space of several weeks if not months; when the very names of the aforesaid legal murderers are forgotten—except so far as they shall be preserved in "the long-living annals of infamy" (quoting the author of "Night Thoughts"), then—I predict—this "Haymarket" monument will be removed from Union Park and in its place, or in a more fitting place, will be erected by the city a monument in bronze and granite to the memory of the men who were the innocent victims of the Haymarket riot; the men who died on the gallows because they would not be false to truth and justice—died because of the fact that in defending the right of the working people of Chicago to meet and discuss their grievances, they were the best defenders the city ever had, or ever can have.

Another evidence of the fact that the Chicago dailies dare not yet tell the truth about the Haymarket affair is the "American's" statement that "the FEW professed Anarchists in the audience applauded," etc., the fact being that the applause was general from every part of the immense hall "filled to the doors," as some of the papers reported. Throughout the address the applause was frequent as well as general and never more emphatic than when references were made that would naturally call out the anarchistic element in the audience.

As to the address itself we cannot, perhaps, do better than reproduce the brief but comprehensive and generally fair report given by the "Chicago Record-Herald":

Prince Kropotkin denied that violence is a characteristic of anarchism or of the anarchistic party, in his address on "Anarchism" at Central Music Hall last evening. He said that it was with deep emotion that he spoke in a city which eleven years ago was the scene of a tragedy that had cost the lives of four excellent comrades, whom he regretted were not now alive fighting for the emancipation of mankind.

"The names of Chicago's executed patriots," he declared, "are deeply respected in Europe as exponents of the cause for which they died, and on such an occasion as this we can almost feel that their spirits are floating in the air about us. It shows the advancement of anarchism when, a short time ago, it was abhorred in this city, and now it brings together so magnificent an audience."

Clarence S. Darrow presided, and the hall was filled to the doors. In introducing the speaker Mr. Darrow showed a contempt of titles and emphasized it by referring to the prince each time as Peter Kropotkin, leaving out all reference to princely rank. He said that Russia had cast out Peter Kropotkin to make him a citizen of the world.

Prince Kropotkin confined himself principally to a discussion of socialistic ideas for the administration of affairs. He favored communism as the most practical solution of present conditions, and said that it could be brought about through education, discussion and thought by all the people. Every child should be taught the use of his hands as well as his brains. He thought that Carnegie had not contributed as much to the world as the man who risks his life for science. In referring to present conditions, he was applauded warmly when he said that the Boers want nothing but independence for their little land, which they love as much as Americans do their own.

As to violence, he said that all who have followed the anarchistic movement for the last twenty-five years know that anarchists are not preaching violence. He characterized capital punishment as an extermination all over the world, on the abominable principle that if a man commits murder society must commit murder to avenge the deed. He proclaimed it as a principle of anarchism that no man has a right to take the life of another man, that one man should not imprison another and that there should be no government of one man by another.

When it is remembered that the price of admission to this lecture was twenty-five cents—to meet the expenses of the hall, which is one of the finest and most popular in the city, it will be seen that, as Kropotkin said, the "advance of anarchism" has been very great since the dark days of 1887, fourteen years ago instead of eleven, as stated in the "Record Herald's" report of the lecture. M. H.

Power of the Press, and of Press Workers.

It goes without saying that in the work of forming, or of changing public opinion the daily and weekly press stands without a rival. Neither the pulpit nor the lecture platform, nor books, nor magazines, nor schools nor colleges, nor any other agency possesses the power of reaching the conscience, the heart and soul of the great masses of people as does the daily and weekly paper.

This being conceded without argument the question naturally arises as to the best method of wielding this tremendous power and guiding it into channels that will make it productive of best results. As at present conducted there is no concert of action—no agreement between those who seek to influence public opinion through the press, as to where and when concentration of effort should be made.

Within a very few years past the need of such agreement and such intelligent concentration has become so apparent to many minds that an effort has been made, with very encouraging results, to form an association or club of Press Writers, by means of which association and mutual understanding any given line of educational work can be directed much as the work of an army is directed by concert between the various battalions or corps, though scattered over wide areas of land and sea.

In recent issues of Lucifer articles have appeared, giving us some idea of what is being done to systematize the work of the press writers, notably the letter of D. Webster Groh in number 854, entitled "Shall we have Press-Writers Clubs," and that of Francis B. Livesey in No. 860, on "Press Writers and Press Workers." These letters outline the methods and purposes of the proposed clubs, or associations of writers, in a way that leaves little to be said by me in favor of the plan. In this week's issue is printed another letter from friend Livesey, to which I invite particular attention, as giving a somewhat extended illustration of the method of work proposed by Mr. Livesey, Mr. Groh and others, and suggesting the wisdom of having a column or more of Lucifer set apart every week for the purpose of "target practice," managed by some one who has the necessary qualifications.

With this plan in view I would hereby ask for a consensus of opinion upon the subject, or question, Shall we have a Press Writers' Department in Lucifer's columns? and if so who would be a suitable person to manage that department? M. H.

"Eternal Dissolution of Society."

Commenting on the Kropotkin lecture the "Chicago Chronicle" begins an editorial of some length by saying:

The footboard of the open door of Chicago is held for the moment by Peter Kropotkin, a Russian who for thirty years has been engaged in an ideal experiment for the amiable and eternal dissolution of society. Amiable dissolution, because Kropotkin declares anarchy and violence mutually opposed. . . . . Eternal dissolution, because if mankind should adopt Kropotkin's creed progress would be paralyzed, the race would become extinct by degrees. The corner-stone of Kropotkin's creed is that there shall be no government.

This creed "The Chronicle" calls "A Maudlin Creed," and certainly, from the standpoint of a defender of "society" as it is, "The Chronicle" is in the right.

Kropotkin's creed is that there should be no government of man by his fellow-man. This would necessarily destroy a form of human society that consists of millionaires and beggars, landlords and homeless tramps, government officials who draw salaries of thousands and tens of thousands per year for a few hours of easy and safe work,—that is in fact not work at all,—to be paid for by the hardest toil of those who work long hours in the stifling air of mines and factories, at the imminent peril of life and limb, for little more than a bare subsistence. A society that honors and compels prostitution of mind and body; a society that enslaves womanhood and motherhood, thereby robbing childhood of the right to be born well, and then robs it of its natural right to the earth and its opportunities.

Yes, "The Chronicle" is eminently in the right in thus denouncing Kropotkin and his creed, but would "progress be paralyzed," and would the "race become extinct" if government of man by man should cease?

Was there no progress made by the human race in its march from the lowest forms of animal life upward, until the time when organized human governments were instituted? M. H.

Spiritualism.

The Chicago "Society of Anthropology" continues to draw fairly good audiences to its Sunday afternoon meetings. Last Sunday the subject of discussion was "Babism," the latest oriental cult, to which the attention of the people of Chicago has been called. Next Sunday Prof. Orchardson will make the opening address—subject, "Proofs of Immortality as given by Modern Spiritualism." Those who have heard Prof. Orchardson know that he possesses the power of making an interesting talk on any subject, no matter how trite, worn or hackneyed. Believers and non-believers in the cult known as Modern Spiritualism are cordially invited to attend and take part in the discussion, so far as time limits will permit. Place of meeting, Oriental Hall, Masonic Temple at 3:30 P. M.

CHICAGO READERS of Lucifer are invited to attend the graduating exercises of the Class of Nineteen Hundred and One, of the College of Medicine and Surgery, at Handel Hall, 40 Randolph Street, Saturday eve April 27, at eight o'clock. The directors of this college are A. E. Gammage, President; H. Paxton Nelson, M. D., Vice President; Florence Grant Dressler, M. D., Secretary; J. H. Greer, M. D., Treasurer; C. H. Johnson M. D., all residents of Chicago. The Advisory Board are Wm. F. Taft, M. D., Dean; Chas. J. Lewis M. D., Registrar; F. S. Lewis, Clerk of the College. Letters of inquiry will, presumably, receive prompt attention if directed to the Secretary, Florence Grant Dressler M. D., at 2203 Gladys Ave., Chicago.

CHIEF OF POLICE KIPLEY says, "I have tried to be a policeman first, last and all the time." What of his manhood, meantime?

The Ideal Commonwealth

Shall be—1: Composed of men and women who have outgrown the order of society which results from attachment to vested interests, is founded upon private ownership, is held together and governed by unnatural and arbitrary laws;

2:—It shall be located in Southern California where it is proposed to procure 50,000 acres of land which shall be purchased by means which will be contributed by wealthy persons residing in England, France, Austria, Germany, Russia, Australia, New Zealand and the United States;

3:—The property of the community of whatever nature shall be for the common use of all. Each person will be required to work two hours a day and the product of such labor shall be placed in common store-houses from which each shall draw according to his need;

4:—The dwellings shall be circular and shall be conducted on the co-operative or individual plan according to the desire of those entering into the experiment;

5:—There will be a circular temple which shall typify the perfected individual. The outer circle will represent the body, the second will represent the mind, and the inner circle which will be a chamber of silence, will typify the spirit. The object of those who will meet in this temple will be to bring perfect harmony between the subjective and objective spheres. Persons from all parts of the world who believe in the universal communism of love will meet in this temple for the purpose of devising methods of bringing into universal objectivity a civilization in which all men will work for the common good; a society which in structure and organism the kingdom of Heaven will be realized;

6:—The colony shall be governed by the law of Love alone. It will be a realm in which (quoting PROF. GEO. HERRON) "there will be neither 'mine' nor 'thine'; a realm beyond the reach of weights and measures, morals and laws, in which there is neither wage nor interest, neither price nor bargain, servant nor master, a realm in which there is no more question about how much one shall have over and above another than there is question about a division of the air for individual breathing." In short, the use of money, commercial or economic values will be entirely eliminated and all efforts will be directed toward bringing about a realization of the highest aspiration of the soul;

7:—Ideal Love between the sexes will be promulgated and the purity of normally-expressed sex-life will be established.

It is the belief of the founder that a race of spiritual, intellectual and physical kings and queens will soon be produced if procreation is sought only when ideal love exists. Address

"The Infidel Woman."

BY ELSIE COLE WILCOX.

Says Ella Wheeler Wilcox: "To me the most repellant object on earth is a woman infidel."

Oh! Ella! Ella! my illustrious name-sake! what agonies of repulsion you must endure when you stand before your mirror, arranging your beautiful auburn locks in a manner most becoming to your lovely face!

Do you not recognize the Infidel in that reflection? Strange! But what is an Infidel, anyway?

The great majority of Christians will say an Infidel is one who rejects our holy religion.

And the majority claim as "our God" that same "petty, spiteful little being" you so scornfully repudiate.

Ah! my dear Ella, you are a sad Infidel! Outside of this belief in a "petty, spiteful little being," what authority have you for prayer?

If this "Eternal Breast," this "Great All Soul" is really a "Swerveless Force," of what use is prayer?

Doesn't it strike you as rather silly, to say the least, to pray every hour in the day, or even one hour, or one minute in the day, to a "Swerveless Force?" I used to admire you, Ella, when I read your glowing "Poems of Passion," for your living, throbbing heart seemed palpitating close to mine; and I, even I, "an Infidel woman," felt a "warm and sympathetic" emotion in response to the warmth of yours.

But, after all, it must have been a snare and delusion, for we are both Infidels!

There could have been no "warmth" in your heart and no "sympathy" in mine, for you are infidel to the "God of Israel" and I am infidel to all gods!

But Ella, dear, where shall we put our Elizabeth Stantons, Susan Anthonys, and others of their class, who are too large-minded to worship the gods of petty spite that must be praised and prayed to before they will condescend to aid their creatures? And even then, as you say, "we do not always get that for which we pray."

Where shall we put such women as Elmina Drake Slenker who has shown the "warmth and sympathy" of her heart by a long life spent in trying to better humanity, to raise men and women to a level with even the brute creation. For many of them are far below that level now, and the lowest are among those who pray loudest and longest. Would it not accord better with your ideas of true womanly warmth and sympathy, to give all women due credit for the good in their natures, regardless of gods, spooks, prayers and hoodoos?

Honestly, now, isn't a woman who goes about her duties in a calm self-reliant manner, knowing herself strong enough to perform them well, just as much entitled to your respect as the weak, emotional, hysterical nervous wreck, who breaks down, rushes to her bed-room and falls on her knees in a paroxysm of tears, beseeching the "Great All Soul" or the "petty, spiteful little being" to give her wisdom and strength, which, ten to one, he refuses to do?

We Infidels, Ella, you and I, should be very careful how we talk and write, even for pay! Of course the "syndicate" wanted just that sort of letter, and you ground it out to suit the occasion. But believe me, you could have been in better business.

Lawrence, Washington, Mar. 29, 1901.

"An Infidel Woman."

BY ALLIE LINDSAY LYNCH.

For years I have admired much that Ella Wheeler Wilcox has penned, differing from her on some points, yet considering her a woman much more liberal than the majority. When I read her article under discussion in the "Chicago American," I sent in a reply—but have not learned its fate. I noted the request for comments, in Lucifer, and was half inclined to send a response. This weeks issue again moves me to do so.

Ella says: "The infidel woman must lack warmth and sympathy—that highest form of sympathy which is not pity, but love and understanding." In the great bereavement of Mrs. Ingersoll and daughters, there was a display of love that drew the sympathy of the world to them, and gave evidence that they possess warmth of feeling as intense and true as any woman of whom we have read. They are infidel women, widely honored by men and women who have reasoned away from belief in any sort of "God idea;" and to slur infidel women is to insult the fearless thinkers of our age. Their fearlessness has led to research which has discovered facts that prevent the mind from worshipping that nothing which so many consider "a something they class as God."

Can any one cite a family wherein more of harmony exists than filled the home atmosphere of the great "Infidel Bob" and his loved women folks—infidel women they are if there are any such? I can think of nothing I would grieve over so greatly, had I children, than to know these were to be reared in a home where myths were revered or prayer taught.

Let us be honest. Intelligence and honesty—that honesty which is not shadowed by fear—belong together; and intelligence is brought about by reasoning, and discovering in NATURE a greater evolutionary force than can be narrowed to fit the term "God." Ella certainly stands in need of intellect, however great her education has been giving her such great advantage as to popularity and gain.

Restricted Marriage and Parentage

Such is the title of a chapter in a work which has been recently issued by the Murray Hill Publishing Co., 129 East 28th Street, New York. The well-known popular medical writer, Dr. E. B. Foote, is the author. Dr. W. Duncan McKim (Putnam's Sons, Publishers) has produced a work showing how rapidly pauperism and crime, and idiocy and insanity are increasing under our present haphazard method of human reproduction, and actually advises the painless extinction of the unfortunates as soon as born. His book is entitled "Heredity and Human Progress." It has been favorably reviewed by several of our contemporaries. Dr. Foote, the author of "Home Cyclopedia," presents a much more humane and sensible plan for gradually eliminating such unfortunates by having children born under proper conditions. Moreover, he points a way to effect this reform without unduly trenching upon the freedom and happiness of the individual. It is a unique and interesting chapter. "Home Cyclopedia" is a wonderful work and rightly named. A comprehensive index points the reader to whatever subject of a hygienic, medical, physiological, or social character which immediately engages attention, and invalids especially will find it a work of inestimable value both for its plain hygienic rules and its valuable prescriptions. Dr. Foote is well-known to the reading world. His "Medical Common Sense," "Plain Home Talk," "Science in Story," etc., have had a phenomenal circulation, and "Plain Home Talk" has been translated into the German language, and found German as well as English readers in every part of the world. The publishers of Dr. Foote's new book have faith in the ready acceptance of everything new from his pen; it is said that they have printed 20,000 copies of this new work. It is issued by the Murray Hill Publishing Co., 129 East 28th Street, New York, and by L. N. Fowler & Co., 7 Imperial Arcade, Ludgate Circus, London, E. C. England.

Marriage.

This is the title given to number ten of the current volume of the monthly Light-Bearer Library just issued from the press. It consists of an address delivered before the International Congress of Freethinkers in Chicago, October 4, 1893, by Juliet H. Severance M. D., to which is added a short essay upon the subject of Medical Monopoly, which essay was first printed in the columns of the New York "Truth Seeker."

To the subscribers for the monthly Light-Bearer Library an explanation is due for the late appearance of No. 10. More than two months ago it was stated that this number was "in preparation." The type was set, but from a number of causes, chief of which was sickness in family, the work was stopped until very recently.

Sincerely thanking our good friends for their patience and forbearance, and earnestly hoping there will be no repetition of delays similar to those to which our subscribers have been subjected, we once more ask their co-operation in getting the little magazine before the reading and thinking public.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

'The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents.

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover: 34 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Hilda's Home, By Rosa Graul. "An o'er true tale" of Woman's Wrongs and of one Woman's Struggles and Final Triumphs in her Attempt to Secure Justice for Herself and for her Sisters, Four hundred and twenty-six pages; paper covers 50 cents, Cloth bound $1.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition togetner with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth. $1.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. By E. C. Walker. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"A WOMAN in order to live the purest life, must be FREE, must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially,"—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD," by Henry Olerich. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 4 0 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy Price $1. For sale at this office.

THE SANCTITY OF MARRIAGE, As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution, its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents; for sale at this office.

WHAT SHALL WE DO

To be saved from the unjust conditions in which ignorant and foolish legislation has placed the mothers of the race? And we must be saved, for—

"No nation, wise, noble and brave,
Ever sprang, though the father had freedom,
From the mother, a slave."

We must read, think, act. . . . Read "HILDA'S HOME: A Story of Woman's Emancipation." Price, 50 cents. 426 pages. With each order for this book we will send LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER, free, for Thirteen Weeks. "Hear all sides—then decide." Address

MASKS.

That insoluble thing that I am to you is but the insoluble thing that you are to me,
We exchange masks, we shift places, from east to west we vanish and reappear,
Yet is your face a curtain to me, my face to you a veil,
Walls could not be more thick or fatal to our love.
We gave the mask of the murderer to the hangman—the man remained untouched.
The battlefield was strewn strangely far and full of dead shadows of men from which men had escaped.
Believe me, O brother hated, we hate your mask not you:
Take my heart, O outlaw—the mockery of your soul we slay but you we exonerate.
My taskmaster tasked not me: he dropt his rod wide of its victim.
I forget with all men what they do, I remember only what they intend.
That is your unmasked self whose barrier I tear away:
That barrier of scorn and greed, by your real self effaced.
O brother equal! after the hard words and blows—after the fight and sore—
More than ever I hunger to batter down all impediment.
And beat my way to your heart.

Love, Sacrifice, Parenthood.

BY J. WILLIAM LLOYD.

Love is need and the satisfaction of need, but selfish love is never satisfactory, because the highest satisfactions of love come only through the contradiction of sacrifice. The yearning of true love is to give, and the more it gives the more self-joy it feels. Sacrifice is the yielding of a precious thing that a more precious thing may come, as in olden days men offered the firstlings of their flocks to obtain favors from the gods. Enlightened egoism must work out as altruism and again, because finally we are all one, altruism is fundamentally egoistic.

Love between man and woman, then, never attains its deepest satisfactions and contents till it is "for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer," but there is a perilous point here. Sacrifice and submission to the desires of the loved one may itself be a selfishness and weakness, bearing evil results for all. Woman, being peculiarly the lover, is peculiarly prone to sacrifice, and her weakness and her besetting sin lie here as well as her strength. Every virtue is potentially a vice, a crime even, and the greater the virtue the greater the peril from its perversion. Tempted by her own nature to sacrifice all to the man she loves, woman is further pressed to do evil by law, and a one-sided code, which tell her that she must and should submit to her husband's desires.

But woman is above all the mother. Her first duty, after the keeping of her self-respect, is to her child. And she stands on the divine and inner side of life, beckoning man toward the Center, and should not abdicate her spiritual leadership. Motherhood is her most sacred function; she is not only mother to her child but to the whole human race. This is the divine law in her which human laws should not outrage. Her body is her temple, she is sole priestess there, by divine right, and it is her place to see that no profane touch approaches.

For her own sake, for her child's sake, for the sake of the coming generations whose doorkeeper she is, she must demand from those who come to her only the purest love and the finest character. As for her life she must keep all others away. She must demand the best from her lover, always, and take no other. If she do not this she is false to her most sacred office and trust. The finest love and the finest manhood, that she may keep soul and body fit for motherhood—that her children may be beautiful and great, well-born and nurtured in the Eden-garden of a true and loving home! For her child's sake a woman should permit no man to be its father unless able to pass her soul's most searching test; for her child's sake she should instantly take it and leave him if his moral atmosphere prove unwholesome for it. Her first duty is to herself and her child; and her first sacrifices should be to her motherhood, not to the man. And in nature, through her elective love, if free, she holds the keys of human character.

Motherhood is woman's peculiar office, all her nature is builded about it, and in proportion as she is supreme and free here the moral order of society is assured. To protect her and co-operate with her in building a more beautiful race should be man's proudest privilege. To invade her freedom and dominion here is to strike at the moral life, to commit the greatest of crimes. Hence the universal horror with which men regard rape, as the most dreadful of pollutions. Hence human law, in subverting the natural order by giving the husband power over the body of the wife, preventing her natural free and sovereign choice of the hour and the man, and her right to divorce herself and her child from any man the moment he proves unworthy, is guilty of the greatest of organized crimes, conspiracy, usurpation, and rape, perversion of social morality, poisoning the fountains of the future, neutralizing the greatest social antiseptic, and bringing all the weight and powers of society to compel one brave woman to abdicate the sovereignty of her body and soul.

There is no influence on earth so divine and uplifting as the yearning of a true man to deserve the admiration and love of a good woman. Liberate this force, and give it its full scope and operation by restoring to woman her power of choice and personal sovereignty, at all times and with all men, and human character will improve as by miracle.

A Tale of Two Hearts and a Head.

BY GEORGE E. MACDONALD.

Birdie McWaters, at the completion of her education in the Convent of the Hopelessly Virgin, found herself left, by her papa's failure to provide, to earn such a living as she might by utilizing the instruction she had received. She spoke French as it is written, she played the piano, and had acquired at great pains a large, angular, and illegible hand especially adapted to disguise the spelling of girls who have received a convent education. What she did not know about the world was only the part which the novelis s omit.

After quitting the convent, and before going out to eut her own feed, she resided with a respectable aunt in Washington square. There are more than a million respectable aunts living in Washington square, as may be learned by reading Marion Crawford and other fictionists dealing with New York life. In this interval between hay and grass, as it were, Birdie spent her time looking out of the bay window of her aunt's residence, parlor floor front, awaiting the arrival of somebody who desired a convent-bred Companion and Educator for their daughter to look her up. One day while employed as above—to wit, while gazing forth from the bay window of the house in Washington square—she perceived a youngish-looking gentleman driving along the street with a smart rig, having a high stepper in the shafts and a bright-red running-gear to his wagon. "Gee!" Birdie said; "I wish that gent wanted someone to look after the education of his kids. He is just my style. Well, I never!"

The exclamation was elicited from the young woman by the gentleman pulling up when opposite where she stood, and preparing to alight. With a good deal of clatter of hoofs and needless stepping around, the horse stopped, and the man, getting action on himself, came up the stoop. Birdie wilted into a chair, but had the self-possession to drop her hands in her lap, one on top of the other, palms up, as she ought, and with elbows well under control. She heard a man's voice outside the door, which in a moment opened to admit Schuyler Van Dix, the hero of this tale. Birdie had scarce time to size him up, and he had not recognized her presence, when her aunt, emerging from the back parlor, took him into her possession. Now this aunt was a hustling business person: she got hold of Mr. Van Dix's purpose right away, and in less than two minutes had found out what he was willing to do in the way of wages for Birdie. He desired a companion and instructor for his daughter, aged six, whom her mother would not permit to attend school for fear that the board of health would vaccinate her. On Birdie being presented to him, he gave her the high handshake, and said he guessed she would do.

Birdie's employer came again the next day, her pupil, six-year-old Kitty, being with him, and took her to his home on the upper West Side. The Van Dixes were swell, all of which sort live in that locality, mostly in Central Park West. Birdie saw Mrs. Van Dix and did not approve of her, because the latter impressed her as sensible, handsome, and not many years under thirty, while Birdie was inclined to be frivolous, was only pretty, and not yet nineteen.

We will skip the next three years, during which time Birdie has remained a member of the Van Dix household. As a teacher she is still ahead of her pupil, though Kittie is a good second. The most important development of the period is a growing intimacy between herself and the father of her pupil, Schuyler Van Dix. They have been thrown together a good deal. She likes running around nights and eating hot suppers, and so does he, while Mrs. Van Dix is more domestic in her tastes; besides, just now she is sewing a fringe on a baby's trousseau. Birdie and Schuyler also attend church on Sunday, which the wife never does, because she says she cannot see anything in it.

Little Kittie's teacher was not a bad girl, and her employer meant to do the right thing. For quite a while they concealed their affection, and neither he nor she mentioned it to her or him, but the inevitable could not be forever postponed. One day Mrs. Van Dix saw them fall upon each other's neck, and smiled. "Children," she said, "enjoy yourselves," and she passed on; but they fell off each other's neck in a hurry.

Birdie knew from the novels she had read that her next play was to quit the house forever, and on the following morning she was gone. As she had no place to go to but her aunt's she went there. Schuyler didn't know what else to do, and he followed her. They met clandestinely several times and then eloped, Schuyler renting a house in the suburbs under another name and becoming a commuter. Mrs. Van Dix made no kicks. The separation from his wife did not wear upon Schuyler, but he forgot to reckon with his children, whom he soon wanted to see in the worst way. In frantic terms he opened negotiations to that purpose with their mother, who calmly inquired why he did not come and see them or reveal his present address so that they might be sent to him. He had Kittie brought to his suburban house, where she told all about the new baby at home and propounded conundrums that made him tired, her quest being to find out why he lived on that side of the ferry. She could not understand. He assured her it was not to be expected that her infantile mind would comprehend that which was too deep for the intellect of Elbert Hubbard.

The proposition may appear strange, but it is true just the same, that time and intimacy proved as efficient in reducing the ardor of these lovers, Birdie and Schuyler, as in ministering to its growth. In a year or two Schuyler never split a wishbone with Birdie but he wished he were situated as he was before he met her. New York presented itself to his mind as an extremely desirable place of residence, though he liked the suburbs and the ride on the cars, and played whist going both ways. Then the silence of the wife he had abandoned caused him to feel insignificant; he had heard of deserted wives tearing up the surface of the earth till they found the recreant one. Mrs. Van Dix was doing nothing of the sort, and although he never forgot that she was an uncommon woman, he felt small because she did not call him back—just as if he were not of any account. Turning his thoughts to Birdie, he frequently recalled how he had first seen her at her at her aunt's, and in his mind would trace the progress of their acquaintance to its present culmination, and then shake his head.

"Would," thought he, as the picture grows,
"I on the stalk had left the rose."

Simultaneously Birdie was having it brought home to her consciousness that love wanes as well as waxes, for although when she asked Schuyler if he loved her as much as ever he invariably replied, "O hell, yes, and more, too!" she suspected that his enthusiasm was forced. Once she asked how he would like to go back to his wife, and he brightened right up. As for herself, she could not help reflecting that besides Schuyler there were others. When the inevitable separation came, he wrote to his wife in abject terms begging to know if he might return. She replied, "This is your house," and in her postscript said she would think better of him if he displayed more independence. Next he asked if he might come back to her, and she answered, "You are the father of my children." It was easy getting there for Schuyler, but once at home his wife shocked his moral and religious sensibilities by ridiculing him and Birdie for running away, when they might have had their illusions shattered on the premises.

Birdie McWaters, once more with her aunt, consulted her favorite writers to learn what move a girl in her peculiar position ought to make. Her authors did not leave her in doubt. Two courses were open to her—to retire into a convent or to atone for her fault by a life devoted to charity and good works, "good works," as everybody knows, meaning gifts to the church. Despite her religious bringing up, it made her hot under her high celluloid collar to think that religion would take advantage of a poor girl's sin to pull her ankle in this way, and the impudence of the writers in condemning her as unfit to walk the same ground with girls who had missed her experience though doing their best to duplicate it, caused her to chuck their books one after another into the corner. She sought the relief she had previously imagined she received from the confessional, but when the priest learned that Birdie was devirginate he asked if he might be her friend, and she shook him and his church for good. To her aunt she also went for advice. That lady, who was wise, deprecated any further cackle on the part of Birdie concerning her little expedition, telling her a story about a parrot that got into trouble by talking too much. "I may as well let you know," she said to the girl, "that you will come into all I have when I am gone. You were under no compulsion to work for a living, and I only sent you out in order that you might learn something from experience. You have learned more than I had reason to hope that you would."

Our heroine felt under conviction of sin toward Mrs. Van Dix, and determined to seek her for the purpose of gaining, if possible, her forgiveness. The wife appeared interested in what she had to say. Birdie got so humble during the interview as to call herself a "vile thing," "an outcast," and so forth, terms which Mrs. Van Dix requested her to withdraw. "I deny," she said with some asperity, "that association with my husband is in any sense degrading. If you are not a better woman today than you were two years ago you have wasted the opportunity of your life for self-improvement." Birdie went away guessing.

As the weeks passed, Miss McWaters felt less and less that she was a sinner with vast penances to be done, and even began to think there might be a future for her. In a few months she forgot the Van Dix episode altogether, and when the right man asked for her hand he found her unresisting. She drew from him that he had a record of his own, so they started even; and they lived happy ever after.

Schuyler Van Dix is a wiser man, and a sadder one only when, indulging in an occasional homily on the morals of his neighbors, it pleases his good wife to recall his own little sidestep. "An error of the heart," he once explained. "Yes," she said, "an error of two hearts; you should be glad there was a head in the family to act as an erratum." He drew the head to his shoulder, and held it there while he made a mental note that his wife was an extraordinary woman.—From the "Truth Seeker," New York.

A Turkish Idea of Love.

BY CATHARINE MAX.

"The Chicago American" of March 7, 1901, printed a letter addressed to Ella Wheeler Wilcox in which the writer relates an incident giving a Turkish woman's idea of love:

"But my friend loved her husband so much that she bought him last week a beautiful Circassian girl. That," the Turkish woman said, "is what we call love!"

In response Mrs. Wilcox writes in part as follows: "It is rather an expression of an Eastern woman's friendship—her idea of friendship—but it is not love."

The sex attraction, understood as love, with a refined and tender nature is probably as unselfish, as self-sacrificing, as any emotion known to the human heart. Parental is said to excel conjugal love, as an incentive to devotion to the individual beloved. But this position is, I think, not supported by sufficient testimony. Be that as it may, certain it is that mothers have been known to aid and abet their sons in indulgence of plural loves. And, likewise, have wives evinced a pure and exalted affection in assisting a husband to gain the favor of an admired lady friend. And this in the face and eyes of the popular superstition that no greater insult can be offered to the wife, no greater dishonor cast upon her name, than that the husband should recognize, or yield to, the attractive power of any woman other than his wife.

Every observer of human nature, sooner or later, must see and acknowledge the growing tendency to plurality in the conjugal affection, especially on the part of men.

It is thought that the enactment of laws for the regulation of the conduct of the "obeying classes" wholly at variance with the prevailing practices of the law-makers themselves, has much to do with the dominance of the aforesaid superstition. Whether this be true or not, we know that the state, resting its claim to authority on this superstition, sells its women citizens into the bondage of legalized prostitution.

This infamous transaction is perpetrated under the name of marriage. For the price of a license the state, through an authorized agent, delivers its bill of sale, conveying to the husband certain prerogatives known as "marital rights;" in return for which he is required to "support" the woman. No cognizance of the woman's labor is taken. She may work nineteen hours out of the twenty-four, or remain idle, according to the wishes, the means or the generosity of the husband. In case the marital rights are withheld the state provides redress through the courts —when the marriage, after "due process of law," is annulled.

Science and religion, institutions in process of "crystallization into law," seem bent and warped to keep in line with and to best conserve the interests of the parasitic or ruling classes. Hence patriotism, one of our popular superstitions, is commonly defined as "love of one's country." More correctly stated, perhaps, it means love of one country. Inspired by this superstitious feeling the average man seldom gets beyond love of his own little "turnip patch"—his own parish, state or nation, and is ready and willing to go forth to fight and kill the unoffending peoples of other and weaker nations.

In its larger and truer sense patriotism means love of all nations, all peoples. The heart and brain of the true patriot loves all lands made sacred by human suffering, human struggle for freedom and justice.

The terrible weight of miscalled civilization that so long has crushed from out the heart of manhood and womanhood the noblest and purest aspirations and ideals, is slowly but surely yielding to the uplifting forces of evolution, which forces, let us hope, are destined, ultimately, to "lift humanity to its feet," and brush the dust of old-time superstitions from all eyes, so that all may see clearly, and no longer be deceived by the chicanery of the ruling and parasitic classes.

Those who make the mistakes of the past the principal thought of the present will have plenty of mistakes to think of in the future.—Selected.

The Mania for Ruling Others.

A press dispatch to the "Chicago American" dated Wichita, Kansas, April 28, says:

Mrs. Carrie Nation, the noted saloon smasher is confined in a cell in the County Jail here, raving mad. She is thought, however, to be only temporarily insane.

Her insanity yesterday and today was acute. She imagines herself to be an apostle sent to the earth to rule. She is confined in a dungeon cell, which has been padded, and she is permitted to have nothing with which to injure herself.

She abuses any one who comes near, and has made several attempts to escape. Every few hours she goes into wild fits and talks rambling to herself.

Saturday morning, when news came that she had better get bonds and come to see her brother, she became more violent. James Ray, her attorney, and Wilbur Jones, former Prohibition candidate for Mayor, called at her cell door and offered to go her bail. She yelled at them wildly: "Get out of here, you scullions of h—l, or I will throw lightning of saints at you. If I want to get out of here I can fly through the walls. The devil is in your hearts."

Making reasonable allowance for exaggerated statement—to which vice many metropolitan dailies seem peculiarly addicted, it would appear from this dispatch that the insanity of Mrs. Carrie Nation has taken a slightly different turn from that heretofore shown. That a really sane woman would go through the country smashing private property with a hatchet, and making public harangues such as this woman has been reported as doing for some months past, would seem incredible—would seem sufficient evidence of unsoundness of mind.

If I had not been a citizen of Kansas for a period of more than fifteen years; if I had not myself associated with the "prohibition" element in that state—having voted for the "prohibitory amendment," more than twenty years ago, that laid the foundation for the various statutory enactments against the liquor traffic in that state, I might easily be persuaded that the reports concerning the saloon smashing feats of Mrs. Carrie Nation and others, are greatly overdrawn. But having been born and educated in an atmosphere of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors as beverages; having been early taught that the "dram-shop" is the "gateway to hell" in the next world, and that liquor-drinking is responsible for most of the poverty, crime and misery in this world I was easily induced to vote for a measure that was OSTENSIBLY intended not to take away the right of the citizen to control his own life and habits but simply to remove temptation from the path of the young, the unwary and the morally and mentally weak.

Being comparatively inexperienced in the game of politics I did not at first see the dirty ropes, the tarred wheels—wheels within wheels, that worked the outwardly fair and innocent-looking thing called the Prohibitory Liquor Law—the law that prohibited the "manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors except for medicinal, mechanical and scientific purposes." It required but a very few months of observation of the working of this law to show its true inwardness, its worse than uselessness as a remedy for the evils of liquor drinking.

"By their fruits ye shall know them." By its working it soon became apparent that the prohibitory legislation was simply a new device by which the professional politician sought to strengthen his power; a device by which the politician went into partnership with the so called learned professions—law, medicine and theology, in order the more surely to perpetuate his power over the gullible and unthinking masses.

Soon after the passage of the "Prohibitory Amendment" in Kansas, in conversation with a leading lawyer, a Democrat in politics, in regard to the laws regulating marriage and divorce,—said he,

"These marriage laws, and penalties for disregarding them, are all wrong, of course, but like the Prohibitory Liquor laws it is useless and foolish to 'buck' against them. The attempt to say what a man shall drink and what he shall not, is all wrong, but neither you nor I, nor my children nor your children, will ever see the repeal of the prohibitory liquor laws of Kansas."

If pressed for a reason, this leading lawyer would have been compelled to acknowledge that it is because the more laws the better for the lawyers and for the ruling classes—for all those who either hold office now or who expect to be office holders in the future, or who desire to have a friend elected or appointed to office. That is to say, all who desire to RULE their fellowmen will conspire to keep the laws from being reduced either in number or invasiveness, provided only that they themselves or their immediate friends can have a share in the honors and emoluments of office.

THE ARMY CANTEEN.

The practical working of the desire to rule our fellowmen in their drinking habits is well illustrated in the attempt to prevent drunkenness in the army by abolishing the army canteen. Thomas B. Gregory, pastor of the "Chicago Liberal Society," closes an article in the Chicago "American" in these words:

As a victory for the women of the temperance society the abolition of the canteen is a success, but it is in no other sense a success. It does not stop the soldiers' drinking—on the other hand it increases it, and also increases its evil effects. It substitutes strong liquors for the comparatively harmless beer, and so adds to the amount and intensity of the drunkenness; and it drives the men from their barracks out into the world, where the harm of their drinking, both to themselves and to others, is greatly multiplied. And so, while the women of the temperance society may have won their point, the cause of true morality has certainly lost by the abolition of the army canteen.

Mr. Gregory had visited Fort Sheridan near Chicago, and had made careful investigation as to working of the new army regulation in regard to the drinking habits of the soldiers.

Comment—Various.

PRESS WRITERS AND WORKERS AGAIN.

Under the head, "Power of the Press, and of Press Workers," some comment was made in last week's Lucifer upon the very modern idea of unifying, concentrating and intelligently directing the, at present, guerrilla-like work of those who—without other pay or hope of reward than the satisfaction the work itself gives to the worker—are trying to arouse the dormant public mind and conscience in regard to the existence and the cure of societary ills.

In that brief explanation of the Press Writers Club, its objects and methods, reference was made to the more extended articles of D. Webster Groh and of Francis B. Livesey on the same subject, closing with the request that a consensus of opinion be had as to whether the plan of having a department in Lucifer, a bureau of information so to speak, as to what the Press Writers are doing, and what they should do, from week to week, and also asking whether it would be well to have some one of these writers to edit a column or page in Lucifer, in the interest of the Press Writers Club and its work.

Hitherto no responses to these requests and suggestions have been received. Believing the plan to have a very close and very important bearing with and upon the work that Lucifer has been trying to do for near a quarter of a century I again ask all who feel a deep and abiding interest in our journal, or journals, and their special line of education and agitation, to send us briefly expressed opinions in regard to the suggestions just mentioned.

"AN EXTRAORDINARY WOMAN."

In the story entitled "Two Hearts and a Head" reproduced in this issue from the pen of G. E. Macdonald, the funny man as well as the philosopher of the New York "Truth Seeker," the heroine, as most people would think, is Birdie McWaters. To my thinking, however, Mrs. Van Dix is far more worthy of that distinction. Women of the Birdie McWaters type are by no means rare but the Mrs. Van Dixes—where are they? Echo answers "where?" To forgive a husband for what law and gospel call the "sin of adultery" is not very uncommon among wives, but to forgive the woman who is supposed to have caused the husband's lapse from marital virtue is usually considered scarcely less disgraceful and sinful than the conduct of the alleged siren herself. According to Grundian ethics to forgive the "woman in the case" is like compounding a felony; it is to become particeps criminis—partaker of the crime.

To some of our readers it may seem something of a desecration to treat with levity a matter of such importance to human weal as the Love Life of women and men—as G. E. Macdonald has done in this story. But there are some superstitions so firmly fixed in the popular mind that reason, argument, cannot reach them. Among these are the superstitions that underlie our conventional marriage laws and customs. To enable people to see the irrationality, the absurdity of these, no method is so effective perhaps, as raillery, sarcasm and ridicule. Hence we welcome as a valiant co-worker the junior editor of the New York "Truth Seeker."

DR HERRON AND HIS DIVORCED WIFE.

The following paragraphs culled from late press dispatches convey their own moral and need little or no comment:

"The divorced wife of Dr. George D. Herron declares she has no hostility or ill feeling toward her former husband or toward Miss Carrie Rand who, it is said, has supplanted her in his affections. Further, she resents criticisms of the professor's course and declares his private affairs have nothing to do with his public career. . . . When it was suggested that Mr. Herron was not wealthy enough to pay a large amount of alimony, and that perhaps Miss Rand was supplying the money she made no answer. She averred it was of no concern to her whether Dr. Herron and Miss Rand married to-day, to-morrow, or any other time, and that the public could draw its own conclusions. She said that for eight years Miss Rand had visited their home just as if she were a sister of the professor or herself. . . . .

"When it was suggested that under the circumstances she showed surprising lack of resentment toward Dr. Herron, Mrs. Herron exclaimed: 'I will say this: Neither Dr. Herron nor Miss Rand has a better friend in the world than myself. I think Dr. Herron is exactly right in refusing to say a word for publication.' She said that she would be willing to defend Dr. Herron were he brought before a Congregational meeting."

When men and women can separate, and reorganize their conjugal relations without publicity, without scandal, without hate, but instead with feelings of mutual respect and esteem,—as expressed by Mrs. Herron, there will be fewer wars of households, fewer wars of neighborhoods and of nations; fewer children born cursed with vicious and criminal tendencies.

With the Workers.

Lois Waisbrooker has resumed the publication of her paper, "Clothed With the Sun," at Home, Washington. Mrs. Waisbrooker does not permit her seventy-five years to persuade her to retire from her life-long field of work. She has had a little house built and in that she will live and publish her paper, the publication of which for at least a year is assured; fifty cents will pay for its monthly visits for a year.

Our neighbors of "Free Society," recently removed to Chicago from San Francisco, have interesting open meetings every Wednesday evening. The meetings are similar in style and subjects discussed to the "Lucifer Circle" meetings of several years ago; and many familiar faces are seen at each meeting. One peculiarity of the distinctively Anarchistic, or, rather, "Communistic-Anarchistic," movement as represented by Free Society, is the large proportion of "foreigners" constituting it. This merely by way of comment. No criticism is intended on either the aforesaid "foreign element" for being interested in Communistic-Anarchism, nor the reverse. "Free Society" is now published weekly, has a "new dress," and is interesting in matter and manner. Send one dollar to A. Isaak, 515 Carroll Ave., and receive it for a year.

A great power for good, is J. C. Hart making of "Brann's Iconoclast." He is giving the benefit of the wide circulation of his magazine to the most advanced ideas—and also, of course, to some ideas not so advanced. It is scarcely necessary to say that I do not agree with everything in the pages of the "Iconoclast." Neither does Mr. Hart himself, for that matter. For instance, he publishes a poem on "The Death of Magdalen," full of the conventional pity—which is more than akin to contempt—contained in the conventional view of the "fallen woman." Here are some of the editorial comments:

"Every line of your poem is written from the conventional point of view, which is essentially a wrong one. The marriage ritual was first instituted for the protection of property in two ways; first, to keep the woman in perfect subjection to her liege lord and master; second, to keep the realty in entail. It has been handed down to us from prehistoric days. Magdalens are the results of the violation of laws which make property of women. Instead of contempt and scorn many Magdalens are worthy of admiration for their noble deeds performed as the advance guard in the struggle for the emancipation of woman from sex slavery.

"You say, 'For those brief hours of sinning I've strived to atone.' How has she sinned, and why atone? There is nothing grander or nobler than the unalloyed love of woman for man or of man for women. If this love is evil neither the minister's nor the magistrate's sanction can make it holy. If it is holy no such sanction is needed except for the purpose of giving the man and woman property rights to each other. In the opinion of many enlightened and intelligent persons such property rights are oftentimes more of a curse than a blessing to woman, and when these rights are insisted upon by the husband the woman soon comes to realize that she has sold herself into slavery. Marriage is no protection for a woman against a husband who is a scoundrel. You should take a broader view of life, a more exalted view of womanhood. You should make no such atonement, nor have your Magdalens do it."

More About the Press Writers.

BY FRANCIS B. LIVESEY.

Correctly speaking, our club is composed of three different classes—Press-Writers, Press-Workers and Honorary Members. Some of us never write for the press, but do a very needed work in watching papers and sending them out; also clippings, etc. The Honorary Member is one in full sympathy who can bestow an occasional dollar on the poorer members to, in some measure, compensate for time spent and stamps used. So far as I see, no club in the land accomplishes as much as ours. We are often an inspiration to editors and a check to law-makers. A man who can simply spend one cent a month by cutting out a clipping or sending a marked paper to some one whom it hits, is worthy of becoming a member. No man is too poor to be one of us.

The big papers are asking their readers and correspondents what they think the editors can do to improve their papers. Let all Press-Writers always answer these questions by suggesting more "letters from the people." I wrote the "Boston Traveler" and "Williamsport (Pa.) Grit" to that effect.

1. Mabel Gifford, Needham, Mass., had an article in "Discontent," Home, Washington, of April 10 on "A Free Press for the People." Every Freethought paper in the land should republish it. It's a pity that the "New York Journal" can't discover this writer to be more of a power and a thought-former than its much paraded Ella Wheeler Wilcox; but, as water finds its level, so genius will ultimately find its height.

2. J. E. L., Me.:—I can perhaps get Freethought papers sent you by those who are done with them, if you will allow me to publish a notice to that effect, stating that you are poor. It is not a crime to be poor or to beg, except on the streets of a big city. I have been very much provoked with some men who have written me "the wolf" was actually at their door, and yet they have been unwilling to have it proclaimed that they might get help from those very able to give it. I am a poor man myself; I care not who knows it, and when I want a thing I ask for it. "Let's be honest," as Ingersoll said, especially when "it's all in the family."

3. Miriam Zieber, 408 North 38th. St, Phila.:—I see your forcible antagonism to the Theosophists in April "New Christianity." Remember the howl that went up from Dr. Buckley when one of his leading ministers joined the Christian Scientists the other day. Press-Writers would do well not to too particularly antagonize the new sects until they have helped us to entirely obliterate orthodoxy.

4. The New York "Daily Sun" and the "Boston Transcript" have been discoursing on the dying out of religious journals. The "Sun," however, has been overwhelmed with voluntary correspondence from believers and Freethinkers alike, and although it has published columns of matter, it says it has given but comparatively few of the letters that have been received. This shows that the sect journals die out because they shut down on free discussion. Keeping their readers in ignorance of the live religious or irreligious issues of the hour, compels the readers to go to the secular papers for the news. The "Sun" has actually stated that every column of its daily issue could be easily filled with letters from the people on this one subject. Just think of it, Press-Writers; ten pages a day small type, 12 by 23 inches, filled with letters on only one subject! I certainly have been rather modest when I told Carnegie that he should give us a paper as large as the New York "Journal" to fill upon all subjects once a week. Who dares to say that the people of this country would not rule it socially, politically and religiously if they were given their expression through the press? They would overwhelm it!

5. The rich "Mrs. F. M. Smith, Astocvilla, Oakland, Calif., is preparing a home in which to raise one hundred girls. She would do better to found a home where the young mothers of love-children, of natural or of "illegitimate" children, could be taken and treated with sympathy and humanity. In doing this she would prevent scores of murders and suicides, and rebuff the clergy who pass by on the other side of such cases, as did Phil Armour's clergyman. A rich Freethinker was once reported anxious to found such a home as the above.

6. Mary A. Livermore, Melrose, Mass., was asked by the Woman's Club of Attleboro, Mass., whether woman has retrograded in the last generation. She replied to Mrs. Frank Bliss, of Attleboro, that "It is not true that women are retrograding, or that they are refusing to marry to be mothers. The world is not lacking population." She further said married people have no right to have any more children than they can properly raise. To this the lively "Baltimore World" of April 15th asks "how the children question is to be regulated?" It says she "apparently wants the matter regulated, and, being an advocate of reform, must certainly have a remedy to apply." The "World" also gives her some timely suggestions. Mrs. Livermore seems to have gotten herself on dangerous ground. It is very true that every reformer must answer questions. If Mrs. Livermore has not gotten a permit from Anthony Comstock, she had better join forces with those of us who are seeking that gentleman's suppression, and then, if she has the "remedy," give it to the public. The Attleboro club and all other woman clubs can also be informed that the first step toward the free discussion of woman questions lies in the treading under foot of Comstockism in all its ramifications. "The Sun" is published at Attleboro, and the "Journal" and "Reporter" at Melrose. The "World's" editorial was headed, "Give us the Remedy;" so any gushing Press-Writer can ask Mrs. Livermore regarding it through her local papers. A few lines from a Press-Writer I have generally found to quite shut up these women club ladies. It ought not so to be; but it proves they are in it for plaudits rather than reform.

7. All Press-Writers should frown down Comstockism wherever it appears. Col. W. H. Thomas, a negro, 94 Tileston, Street, Everett, Mass., wrote a book on the Negro and some of his race in Boston have wished it suppressed by Comstock. I have shown the Negroes their mistake, in Martinsburg West Va., "Pioneer Press," of April 13th—a Negro paper in which I appear almost weekly. I called on Booker Washington to answer the above book, but persecution seems to be the only argument advanced by the race.

8. The anti-vaccinationists have given the Chicago "Record-Herald" something to think about. In Lucifer of April 13th., I stated that Bro. Wheeler had sent out a call for the Press-Writers to answer the paper. In its issue of April 12, it was compelled to to put itself on the defensive in an editorial, headed, "To the Vaccinationists." In the same issue Joshua T. Small, Provinceton, Mass., had a stinging letter of considerable length on page 7. Whether all the letters were printed or not, they nevertheless had due effect on the editor. Thus we see what big results followed Bro. Wheeler's little thoughtful effort and how the Press-Writers go at once to the fountain heads of thought. The editorial concludes: "There will always be a few misguided people who believe with the late Rev. Mr. Jasper that the sun do move." As the Koreshites seem to be "misguided" in this line, I trust they will at once proceed to instruct the "Record-Herald" and stir up the same sensation as they have in the "Baltimore American," with Johns Hopkins professors and others. Their paper is the "Flaming Sword," 314 W. 63 Street, Chicago. I have sent all the particulars relating to the smallpox discussion to "Vaccination," Terre Haute, Ind., in the hope that the anti-vaccinationists will follow up the good example set by the Press-Writers.

9. A. C. Armstrong, 17 Leroy Street, Dorchester, Mass: Your cash toward printing the Groh Press-Writer's circulars at hand. The circular was sent out in MS. form to solicit subscribers, but up to this time not half the necessary fund is at hand. Insomuch as Lucifer and the "Truth Seeker" are taking up the Press-Writer's cause I think it possible that the work we shall do in these papers may be sufficient for the instruction of all prospective Press Writers and that the money that would go for the circulars could do as good duty sending out the papers. It was a generous idea in you to set to work in striking off circulars giving the names and addresses of the eighty-four Press-Writers. They are very much to be desired, and, if necessary, I would vote that you be paid for your trouble. You did well in answering the Rev. E. Davies in the "Boston Globe" of April 11. The clippings in which you have hit the same fraternity in the "Boston Traveler," have been sent around the country.

A Domestic Episode in the Dark Ages.

BY E. C. WALKER.

A middle-aged, stylishly dressed man entered the dining-room of The Hotel Clarendon, in Brooklyn, and, pointing to a man and woman dining at a table in a corner, said to the others present.

"Ladies and gentlemen, that woman there is my wife and that man with her is Dr.——, of McDonough street. Her place is at home, instead of being there, she is here with that man. I beg your pardon for this interruption. I make this explanation that I may not be misunderstood in what I am about to do. There is only one thing that a man can do under such circumstances, and as a man I am about to do it."

He walked over and struck the man a blow in the face. The man did not strike back, but sat as if dazed. Then the ruffian who had struck him said to the woman, "I will wait for you outside." The report in "The Times" continues:

"The woman put on her wraps and followed her husband to the street. Her companion paid his bill quickly and also went out. On the sidewalk the two men met again. There was an exchange of hot speech, but no more blows were struck. The husband finally put his wife into a cab and they drove away together. The other man walked hurriedly away."

The man struck swallowed the gross insult, the spectators did not dare lisp a protest, the woman obediently went home with her bruiser husband. And yet it is said there is no slavery in the United States! Here is a woman, a fugitive, temporarily, from the plantation of her master; a woman of mature years, she goes with another adult to dine in a place of respectable resort; she is pursued by her owner, who humiliates her in the presence of others, assaults her friend, and drags her away to his slave pen. Nobody spit in his face, nobody, not even the man he has outraged, knocks him down or horsewhips him. He is as safe as were the slave owners who, half a century ago, pursued and caught their black chattels in "free" states. What a subject that would make for an artist of the Twenty-fifth Century! "A Domestic Episode in the Dark Ages" would be an apt title for the painting.—From "Brann's Iconoclast."

VARIOUS VOICES.

M. Lida Hoffer, Colo:—I see my figures correspond, and that means pay up. I enclose herewith $4.80. Apply one dollar and twenty-five cents for Lucifer and for remainder send subjoined list of books and pamphlets.

Eva Latham, Denver Co'o.:—Every drop of rain helps to swell the ocean; and that's why I want to tell you that one of your readers clapped her hands to find you are not on the side of vaccination and vivisection. I have been reading your little Lucifer for a few weeks past and am sure the guiding mind behind it is both pure and wide. The stand you took this week so pleased me that I feel inclined to show my approval substantially by sending for the Light-Bearer Library. Inclosed you will find fifty cents for same.

G. F. P., Burlington, Vt.:—The flashlight picture received. It is as good as I expected. Am much pleased with it; have it framed and up in my room. You may think strange that I should care for the picture as all are strangers to me. I will tell you. I am a Freethinker, have never met a woman who is a Freethinker, and but few men—I am entirely alone in that line of thought. I take a number of Freethought papers, all of which I enjoy, but I think Lucifer represents the most advanced thought of any of them and it is a real pleasure for me to have your good father's picture, yours, your dear little Virna's and your many friends; should like very much to have a picture of Mr. Walker; have never seen his. If you can put me in the way to know what Anarchism really is I should feel under obligations to you. If you have any subscribers in Vermont will you please send me their names as I may be able to look them up. I enclose a few names you might send sample copies to, and if you should get a subscriber from the list should be pleased to know it.

[If any of Lucifer's readers in Vermont or elsewhere wish to communicate with the above writer, letters will be forwarded from this office.]

B. R., Pa.:—Your several packages of my order have arrived safely. I am a very liberal Quaker, and want to see one of your publications which alludes to the sect—but cannot now find its title. I also enclose $1. for whichever is best of Grant Allen's—"The Woman Who Did," or "British Barbarians." Your judgment will satisfy me. I am delighted with your vivisection ideas; and with your bravery to speak out your convictions—even if I cannot agree with them all. I want to read the best I can get and try to enlighten some of these "old fogies."

R. W., Michigan:—I heartily agree with nearly all of the ideas advanced in your publication and think that some day they will be widely accepted. That is, after people have wit enough to know what is good for them. But, as you so well know, it takes a very long time for people to learn even a little bit. And even that small amount is learned only by bitter experience. Enclosed find twenty-five cents for "The Bar Sinister and Licit Love;" you see, I am interested to know more about you. We hope the future will see more like you who will advocate that which should be.

Box 356, New Glarus, Wis.:—No. 857 has failed to reach me; will you kindly mail me a copy. I notice by the number on my wrapper that my subscription is past due. Why did you not blue-pencil my copy? Perhaps you had not noticed it yourself. I enclose a dollar bill with which to renew. I would be glad to enclose the names and amounts for a few trial subscribers for Lucifer, but really I do not at present know of any parties to whom I feel at liberty to send it. I know of one however, but she is about to change her address, so I better wait. But you shall have that before long and may be I will be able to get one or two more.

There are so many people, even among radicals, who upon this question of the right relation of the sexes, are ultra-conservative that I am obliged to hesitate before venturing to send Lucifer to anyone. The present system of marriage and sex-exclusiveness seems so deeply rooted in the minds of the people that very few of them, it seems to me, have even begun to question the wisdom or soundness of it.

I am pleased with Lucifer myself, although the question of economic freedom takes precedence in importance over that of sex freedom in my own mind, and I am inclined to think we will not enjoy very much of freedom either of thought or love relations until we have economic or industrial freedom.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers; 207 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

HELEN WILMANS,

Who has tested her ideas and is now reaping a rich reward from them financially, has written out the secret of her success and printed it in a book called "THE CONQUEST OF POVERTY." Forty thousand copies of which sold before it was fairly off the press. Paper 50 cents. Address Freedom Publishing Co., Sea Breeze, Florida.

A PHYSICIAN IN THE HOUSE.

A New Family Medical Work, by Dr. J. H. Greer.

This book is up-to-date in every particular.
It will save you hundreds of dollars in doctors' bills.
It tells you how to cure yourself by simple and harmless home remedies.
It recommends no poisonous or dangerous drugs.
It teaches how to save health and life by safe methods.
It teaches prevention—that it is better to know how to live and avoid disease than to take any medicine as a cure.
It is not an advertisement and has no medicine to sell.
It has hundreds of excellent recipes for the cure of the various diseases.
It has 16 colored plates, showing different parts of the human body.
The chapter on Painless Midwifery is worth its weight in gold to women.
The "Care of Children" is something every mother ought to read.
It teaches the value of Air, Sunshine, and Water as medicines.
It contains valuable information for the married.

This book cannot fail to please you. If you are looking for health by the safest and easiest means, do not delay getting it. It has eight hundred pages, is neatly bound in cloth with gold letters, and will be sent by mail or express, prepaid to any address for $2.50. Address M Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

THE MAN WHO UNDERSTOOD MAN.

There was a man who understood music,
And right at the very next door
There was a man who understood science—
And neither knew anything more.
And next to him was a metaphysician
Of deep psychological lore,
And next to him was a great theologian—
And neither knew anything more.
And all around these was a business crew,
Who attended to business—and that's all they knew.

And it happened that the man who understood music
Was the dreariest kind of bore—
A bore to the man who understood science,
Who lived at the very next door.
And they both were bores to the metaphysician,
And both were incurably dreary;
And all of the three made the great theologian
Most unintermittently weary.
And the men all around them, the business crew,
With none of the four had the first thing to do.

For the musical man told the scientist man
All the musical lore that he knew;
And the scientist man did the musical man
With his scientist volleys pursue.
And every day did the great theologian
The metaphysician assail,
That he might disembogue in his palpitant ear
His long metaphysical tale.
For every one reached for the other one's ear—
All wanted to talk and none wanted to hear.

And oft it happened the metaphysician
To the business people would rant
Of Spenser, Spinoza, Heraclitus, Plato,
Protagoras, Schelling, and Kant.
And the business men, while the metaphysician
Through his logical labyrinth glides,
Are thinking of dry goods and leather and lumber
And hardware and horses and hides.
Each overstretched intellect uttered his word—
And every one lectured and nobody heard,

But there was a man who understood man, sir,
And he never knew anything more.
They all poured their wisdom in showers upon him—
He begged they'd continue to pour.
"Oh, tell me of music, and tell me of science,
And deep metaphysical lore."
And he'd sit and he'd listen in wondering silence,
And hungrily ask them for more.
And they made him the leader of all of their clan—
This wise ignoramus who understood man.

This wise ignoramus who understood man, sir,
Seemed raptured, astounded, and dazed;
At the width and the wealth of their wise erudition
He'd sit in deep wonder amazed!
And he gulped all the flood of their deep-flowing knowledge
In hungry voracity down;
So he came to the town where these other men lived,
And became the first man of the town.
And they thought him the deepest of all of their clan—
This wise ignoramus who understood man.

The Gardener's Story.

BY OCTAVE MIRBEAU.

He was a gardener, who had been a widower for four months and who was looking for a place. Among the many lamentable faces that passed through the bureau, I saw none as sad as his, none that seemed to me more overwhelmed by life. His wife had died of a miscarriage. . . . of a miscarriage? . . . . the night before the day when, after two months of poverty, they were at last to take positions on an estate,—he in charge of the garden, she in charge of the barnyard. Whether from ill-luck or from weariness and disgust of life, he had found nothing since this great misfortune; he had not even looked for anything. And during this period of idleness his little savings had quickly melted away. Although he was very suspicious, I succeeded in taming him a little. I put into the form of an impersonal narrative the simple and poignant tragedy that he related to me one day when I, greatly moved by his misfortune, had shown more interest and pity than usual. Here it is:

When they had examined the gardens, the terraces, the conservatories and the gardener's house at the park entrance, sumptuously clothed with ivies, climbing plants and wild vines, they came back slowly, without speaking to each other, their souls in anguish and suspense, toward the lawn, where the countess was following with a loving gaze her three children, who, with their light hair, their bright trinkets, and their pink and prosperous flesh, were playing in the grass, under the care of the governess. At a distance of twenty steps they halted respectfully, the man with uncovered head and holding his cap in his hand, the woman, timid under the black straw hat, embarrassed in her dark woolen sack, and twisting the chain of a little leather bag, to give herself confidence. The undulating green-sward of the park rolled away in the distance, between thick clusters of trees.

"Come nearer," said the countess, in a voice of kind encouragement.

The man had a brown face, skin tanned by the sun, large knotty hands of the color of earth, the tips of the fingers deformed and polished by the continual handling of tools. The woman was a little pale, with a gray pallor underlying the freckles that besprinkled her face,—a little awkward, too, and very clean. She did not dare to lift her eyes to this fine lady, who was about to examine her inconsiderately, overwhelm her with torturing questions, and turn her inside out, body and soul, as others had done before. And she looked intently at the pretty picture of the three babies playing in the grass, already showing manners well under control and studied graces.

They advanced a few steps, slowly, and both of them, with a mechanical and simultaneous movement, folded their hands over their stomachs.

"Well," asked the countess, "you have seen everything?"

"Madame the Countess is very good," answered the man. "It is very grand and very beautiful. Oh! it is a superb estate. There must be plenty of work, indeed!"

"And I am very exacting, I warn you,—very just, but very exacting. I love to have everything perfectly kept. And flowers, flowers, flowers, always and everywhere. However, you have two assistants in summer, and one in winter. That is sufficient."

"Oh!" replied the man, "the work does not worry me; the more there is, the better I like it. I love my calling and I know it thoroughly,—trees, early vegetables, mosaics, and everything. As for flowers, with good arms, taste, water, good straw coverings, and—saving your presence, Madame the Countess—and abundance of manure, one can have as many as one wants."

After a pause he continued: "My wife, too, is very active, very skillful, and a good manager. She does not look strong, but she is courageous and never sick, and nobody understands animals as she does. In the place where we last worked there were three cows and two hundred hens."

The countess nodded approvingly. "How do you like your lodge?"

"The lodge, too, is very fine. It is almost too grand for little people like us, and we have not enough furniture for it. But one need not occupy the whole of it. And besides, it is far from the chateau, and it ought to be. Masters do not like to have the gardeners too near them. And we, on the other hand, are afraid of being embarrassed. Here each is by himself. That is better for all. Only——"

The man hesitated, seized with a sudden timidity, in view of what he had to say.

"Only what?" asked the countess, after a silence that increased the man's embarrassment.

The latter gripped his cap more tightly, turned it in his fat fingers, rested more heavily on the ground, and, making a bold plunge, exclaimed:

"Well, it is this: I wanted to say to Madame the Countess that the wages do not correspond with the place. They are too low. With the best will in the world it would be impossible to make ends meet. Madame the Countess ought to give a little more."

"You forget, my friend, that you are lodged, heated, lighted; that you have vegetables and fruits; that I give a dozen eggs a week and a quart of milk a day. It is enormous."

"Ah, Madame the Countess gives milk and eggs? And she furnishes light?"

And he looked at his wife as if for advice, at the same time murmuring:

"Indeed, that is something! One cannot deny it. That is not bad."

The woman stammered:

"Surely that helps out a little." Then, trembling and embarrassed:

"Madame the Countess no doubt gives presents also in the month of January and on Saint Fiacre's day?"

"No, nothing."

"It is the custom, however."

"It is not mine."

In his turn the man asked:

"And for the weasels and polecats?"

"No, nothing for those either; you can have the skins."

This was said in a dry, decisive tone, that forbade further discussion. And suddenly:

"Ah! I warn you once for all that I forbid the gardener to give or sell vegetables to anyone whomsoever. I know very well that it is necessary to raise too many in order to have enough, and that three-fourths of them are wasted. So much the worse! I intend to allow them to be wasted."

"Of course, the same as everywhere else!"

"So it is agreed? How long have you been married?"

"Six years," answered the woman.

"You have no children?"

"We had a little girl. She is dead."

"Ah! that is well; that is very well," approved the countess in an indifferent tone. "But you are both young; you may have others yet."

"They are hardly to be desired, Madame the Countess, but they are more easily obtained than an income of three hundred francs."

The countess's eyes took on a severe expression.

"I must further warn you that I will have no children on the premises, absolutely none. If you were to have another child, I should be obliged to discharge you at once. Oh! No children! They cry, they are in the way, they ruin everything, they frighten the horses and spread diseases. No, no, not for anything in the world would I tolerate a child on my premises. So you are warned. Govern yourselves accordingly; take your precautions."

Just then one of the children, who had fallen, came crying, to take refuge in his mother's gown. She took him in her arms, lulled him with soothing words, caressed him, kissed him tenderly and sent him back to rejoin the two others, pacified and smiling. The woman suddenly felt her heart growing heavy. She thought that she would not be able to keep back her tears. Joy, tenderness, love, motherhood, then,-were for the rich only? The children had begun to play again on the lawn. She hated them with a savage hatred; she felt a desire to insult them, to beat them, to kill them; to insult and kill also this insolent and cruel woman, this egoistic mother, who had just uttered abominable words, words that condemned not to be born the future humanity that lay sleeping in her womb. But she restrained herself, and said simply, in response to a new warning, more imperative than the other:

"We will be careful, Madame the Countess; we will try."

"That's right; for I cannot too often repeat it to you,—this is a principle here, a principle upon which I cannot compromise."

And she added, with an inflection in her voice that was almost caressing:

"Moreover, believe me, when one is not rich it is better to have no children."

The man, to please his future mistress, said by way of conclusion:

"Surely, surely, Madame the Countess speaks truly."

But there was hatred within him. The somber and fierce gleam that passed over his eyes like a flash gave the lie to the forced servility of these last words. The countess did not see this murderous gleam, for she had fixed her eyes instinctively onthe person of the woman whom she had just condemned to sterility or infanticide.

The bargain was quickly concluded. She gave her orders, detailed minutely the services that she expected of her new gardeners, and, as she dismissed them with a haughty smile, she said, in a tone that admitted of no reply:

"I think that you have religious sentiments, do you not? Here everybody goes to mass on Sunday, and receives the sacrament at Easter. I insist upon it absolutely."

They went away without speaking to each other, very serious, very sober. The road was dusty and the heat oppressive, and the poor woman walked painfully, dragging her legs after her. As she was stifling a little, she stopped, placed her bag upon the ground and unlaced her corsets.

"Ouf!" she exclaimed, taking in deep breaths of air.

And her figure which had been long compressed, now swelled out, revealing the characteristic roundness, the stain of motherhood, the crime. They continued on their way. A few steps further on they entered an inn by the roadside, and ordered a quart of wine.

"Why didn't you say I was pregnant?" asked the woman. The man answered:

"What? That she might show us the door, as the three others have done?"

"Today or tomorrow makes but little difference."

Then the man murmured between his teeth:

"If you were a woman,—well, you would go this very evening to Mother Hurlot. She has herbs."

But the woman began to weep. And in her tears she groaned:

"Don't say that; don't say that! That brings bad luck."

The man pounded the table, and cried:

"Must we, then, die, my God!"

The bad luck came. Four days later the woman had a miscarriage. . . . a miscarriage! . . . and died in the frightful pains of peritonitis.

And, when the man had finished his story, he said to me:

"So now here I am, all alone. No wife, no child, nothing. I really thought of revenging myself; yes, for a long time I thought of killing those three children that were playing on the lawn, although I am not wicked, I assure you. But that woman's three children, I swear to you I could have strangled with joy! Oh! yes. But then I did not dare. What do you expect? We are afraid; we are cowards; we have courage only to suffer!"

—From "A Chambermaid's Diary." Translated by Benj. R. Tucker.

Vaccination.

BY FLORA W. FOX.

Yes, this is a legitimate subject for Lucifer to take up, as a thorough understanding of it is absolutely necessary to preserve health. It is of greatest value to mothers as the measure of health depends so largely upon them.

Vaccination is surely one of the most flagrant crimes of the age. I can do no better than to take some points, yes, vaccination points, from a pamphlet, "Vaccination a Curse," by Dr. C. W. Amerige, Springfield, Mass., 1895.

"Smallpox is supposed to be prehistoric in its origin. Introduced into Europe from Asia more than 1,000 years ago. Introducing causes are constitutional impairment and filthy environments, hence perfect health and cleanliness are the very best safeguards. In 1798 Edward Jenner asserted that 'the person who had thus been affected (by his system of vaccination) was forever after secure from the infection of smallpox. That there was no such thing as spontaneous cowpox, but that it was communicated to bovines by the filthy hands of men who had been grooming horses afflicted with the constitutional disease called grease, glanders, farceny, and which in man is identical with tuberculosis.'

"Jenner advised the use of this 'grease' virus, and his first subject died with pulmonary consumption. Jenner's own son was his next victim and he died with the same disease. Alex. Wilder, Editor and Professor of Physiology in the United States Medical College, New York, says: 'Vaccination is the infusion of a contaminating element into the system and after it you can never hope to regain the former purity of the body, and thus tainted is made liable to a host of ailments. Consumption follows in the footsteps of vaccination as certainly as effect follows cause and where it is common to vaccinate, scrofula and tuberculosis are general, and syphilis appears oftener as a result than from other causes. A vaccinated people will be short-lived, sickly and degenerated.'

"The 'Siglo Medico' a Spanish medical journal in 1865 said, that out of 304 vaccinations, 224 were syphilized!

"Dr. R. K. Noyes, once resident surgeon of Boston City Hospital: 'I believe vaccination has been the greatest delusion that has ensnared the human race for three centuries. Is unscientific and promotor of grave evils.'

"Dr. J. E. Coderre, Professor of Materia Medica, Montreal: 'The idea of introducing into a healthy organism the virus of an inflammatory and gangrenous malady in order to keep it from disease which does not exist, is revolting to common sense.'

"Dr. Mitchel of British House of Commons: 'Vaccination has made murder legal. It does not protect and is followed by blindness, scrofula and consumption and is the most colossal humbug the race has been burdened with.'

"Dr. Bakwell, Vaccinator General of Trinidad: 'There is a strong opinion amongst medical men of the West Indies that vaccination communicates leprosy.'

"Dr. Epps who was director of the Jenner institution for twenty-five years: 'Vaccine virus is a poison. As such it penetrates all organic systems. It is neither antidote nor corrigent; nor does it neutralize the smallpox, but only paralyzes the expansive power of a good constitution, so that disease falls back upon the mucous membranes. Nobody has the right to transplant such a mischievous poison into the life of any child,' —or adult, he might have added."

This man's opinion is of great value; however it causes one to wonder where his conscience was hidden for twenty-five years! "A wise man changes his opinion, a fool, never!"

Prof. Pickering of London, in a speech before the State Committee on Public Health, in Boston in 1894, and who has given much time to this class of diseases, says: "Smallpox is one of four diseases which wrought havoc some hundreds of years ago; the plague; the black death; the sweating sickness and smallpox, and all but smallpox were eradicated, and that would have been, had it not been kept alive by vaccination."

"We have no known test by which we can possibly distinguish between a lymph that is harmless and one that might communicate venereal disease," says Prof. E. M. Crookshank, a very eminent authority on bacteriology, of King's College, London, England.

Dr. Winterburn tells us that "medical men are no better and never have been any better than the public demand." Make them responsible for professional acts and none would vaccinate. Hence, we, the people are mostly to blame for this dangerous, authoritarian medical monopoly.—the greatest on earth, where a doctor or Board of Health officer can enter your home and lawfully and awfully poison your children and yourself. My child has never been vaccinated and I hope she has grit enough to use her little "hatchet" philosophy on any one who would infringe her right to a healthy, pure body and mind. Our city is being revaccinated and of course the children are in splendid (?) health to study, with swollen arms, aching heads and nervous prostration! Parents and people, awake and demand a cessation of this murderous vaccination blood poisoning.

"Yes," said the statesman with the kindly eye but firmly set mouth, "I like to read about Noah and the Ark." "What brought them to your attention?" "Nothing in particular. I couldn't avoid being struck by the manner in which Noah and his sons went to work and carried the enterprise through without asking a penny's assistance from the government. But, of course, those were primitive days."—The Washington Star.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so-called from its brightness—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving Light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing Light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of Light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

"OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS" will be the subject for discussion at the Chicago "Society of Anthropology," Sunday May 12. Few subjects that could be proposed possess greater interest for the humanitarian, the parent and the tax-payer than does the public school question, and it is hoped the attendance will correspond to and with the importance of the subject. Love Dies—Why Should Love Die?

From her mountain home in Colorado May Huntley writes me as follows:

You said editorially that you could not see any reason for the tragic ending of the lives of Fern and Christobel in the little story called "Nature and the Law," and you ask "why does she not let them live long enough to show the superiority of 'Love in Freedom' and 'Motherhood in Freedom' over the conventional kind or kinds."

I will tell you, though I would better not tell the public perhaps, that it was because I don't know how. I have never seen a really happy and model motherhood or even loverhood in "Freedom." They may exist and I have not had the good fortune to have seen them. Mutual love is beautiful wherever seen, and I do not think the lovers at such a time ever stop to remember whether they are free or not. But alas! Love dies. It dies out with married couples and it seems to me more quickly with unmarried couples. The death of love is the saddest thing in the world in marriage or out of it. And so as I could not bear to look forward and see my pure, free, innocent characters growing old and commonplace, and tired and dull with each other, nor any easier could I see them seeking other lovers and forgetting their own sweet, unselfish passion for each other; so to me, the best and least sad ending was to have them to die in each other's arms, in the fullness and freshness of their first love.

Two young, ignorant, innocent young people cannot be insured happiness by merely ignoring the marriage ceremony. Without some wisdom and good judgment, they were more likely to meet wreck and ruin both in their lives and their happiness than anything else. The story follows "logical consequences." Happiness in love relations is a great problem. The abolition of an old, established ceremony will not solve it. Study, experience, a better economic condition, the cultivation of judgment and the understanding of human needs and relationships, and time, only can bring about a more harmonious adjustment of sex relationships. I admit we must have freedom in order to progress; but freedom alone does not bring us directly to the threshold of perfection.

You are at liberty to use the above if you think best, but it might be more dignified in the author not to expose the fact that she does not know any better than her readers, how the two lovers might have proved the superiority of freedom in love. However I do not mind if you publish me, and I would like to read your comments. Yours sincerely, MAY HUNTLEY.

I have here reproduced the letter exactly as written. For the present will make but very brief comment.

First—Am glad to note the evident candor, the intellectual honesty of the writer of the letter and of the story. As I see it, the most discouraging persons we meet with are those who "know it all;" those who have solved the mysteries of life, of the universe, and who talk to us with a lofty, self-assured, self-assertive air and patronizing manner, as though it were an act of great condescension on their part to undertake the task of enlightening the benighted minds of their hearers.

Of this class are nearly all churchmen and church women; also many Spiritualists, Theosophs, Christian and Mental Scientists, etc., with not a few who call themselves Materialists, Physical Scientists, "Freethinkers" par excellence—Positivists, Rationalists, Egoists, etc.

In our search for knowledge on any line the first step, it would seem, is to find out the impediments in the way, the difficulties to be overcome, and it is always, as I think, a hopeful sign when an investigator frankly acknowledges her or his ignorance. In the great university of life it is well that we all take our places in the "Freshman" class, whatever may be the number of our years, or however great the honors, the titles, that may have been conferred upon us by our fellow tyros, our contemporary ignoramuses. In all institutions of learning the worst behaved students are the "Sophs"—the "Sophomores," which means the "wise fools!"

With May Huntley I frankly acknowledge my ignorance. I have been an investigator of social problems many more years than has the writer of the story, "Nature and the Law," but have not yet got beyond the "Freshman" class. With her I say, "Happiness in love relations is a great problem." With her "I have never seen a model motherhood [my ideal motherhood] or even loverhood in freedom." With her I can say, "The abolition of an old established [marriage] ceremony will not solve" the problem.

Thus far we are agreed, substantially agreed, but I do not share the pessimistic feeling, the almost hopeless feeling expressed in this letter, and in other letters received from her and from many who have written us on the same subject.

For the present I close by asking Lucifer's readers to join us in a symposium, a briefly-worded investigation of the problem proposed by May Huntly. Why should love die? Why should an author kill her children of nature in order to prevent a more disastrous ending of love's young dream? M. H.

Comment—Various.

"COURAGE ONLY TO SUFFER."

The very pathetic ending of the realistic story found on the first page suggests the query, Where is the remedy? Will it ever be better so long as the mothers are too cowardly to demand self-ownership of person, and proper environments for their maternal work—as conditions precedent to conjugal union?

THE MACDONALD-GOLDMAN CONTROVERSY.

As often stated in these columns the scribe of Lucifer has little skill and less taste in and for personal controversy. As Burns says of praying, "It's a thing I ha no skill o't; I'm quite unused and wretched ill o't." Impersonal discussion is much to be preferred, as a general rule. But Lucifer's columns are first of all a free platform for the discussion and investigation of the "cause that lacks assistance, and of the wrongs that need resistance."

The "Truth Seeker" of New York poses before the public as "A Journal of Freethought and Reform." This is its sub-title. It claims to "be the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country." It claims a larger circulation than any other Freethought publication—claims that its subscribers are counted by the million. It "believes in Free Speech, Free Press and Free Mails; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects," etc.

Emma Goldman is recognized far and wide as one of the Liberal lecturers of this country. She is one of those who do "not quail in the shadow of the jail," but stands to her colors through evil as well as good report. That she has achieved an honorable reputation as a public lecturer is attested by the fact that she was accorded the privilege of making the opening address at a meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club of New York. It has long been the custom of the "Truth Seeker" to report the proceedings of this club, and when the report of this meeting by Cyrus W. Coolridge, the regular reporter of said club for the "Truth Seeker," failed to appear it was but natural that the secretary of the club, M. J. Terwilliger, should make inquiry for the reason of such suppression.

In "Truth Seeker" March 23, an editorial answer is given to the inquiry of Mr. Terwilliger, as follows:

"The report reached the galley stage, and died there. It seems that Miss Goldman devoted a portion of her lecture to an apology for what are generally spoken of as crimes against nature, as she had a right to do, but we saw no way of reproducing her remarks, even by the use of euphemisms, without giving offense. But having blue-penciled that part of the report, and while minded to print the rest, it occurred to us that perhaps the fair lecturess regarded the matter deleted as the gem of her thesis, and that the omission of it might be justly condemned as garbling; we therefore concluded to let the tail go with the hide. We are inclined to believe that the report we turned down was rather more damaging to Miss Goldman's reputation as a conservative thinker than the misrepresentations in the daily press, which wouldn't be believed anyhow. We may say that we sustained a perusal of the report without demoralization: how it might have affected the unilluminated is another matter, and hence we applauded the determination of the reporter to try it on the readers of Lucifer, who are tough."

Mr. Terwilliger had called the editor's attention to the fact that Miss Goldman's address had been badly misrepresented in the daily papers, and that simple justice required that the facts of the case be published, appealing to the "Liberal press for vindication."

By reading the letter of Eugene Macdonald to me, as printed in Lucifer, April 13, it will be seen that the above editorial reply to Terwilliger was written by George E. Macdonald and not by the editor-in-chief. This explanation would seem to divide the moral responsibility of the suppression between the elder and the younger Macdonald. Later the junior editor gave a version in the "Truth Seeker," of Miss Goldman's lecture, from hearsay, but as hearsay evidence is usually ruled out of court it will be considered a poor substitute for that of Coolridge, who claims to have heard the lecture entire. While George's version is generally favorable to the lecturer he seems not unwilling to join the censors when he says, "The description of the address as 'frank all through and generally gross' may be allowed to stand. They tell me it was pretty raw."

The old Latin maxim, de gustibus non est disputandum—"There can be no disputing about tastes," is applicable here. Having listened to Miss Goldman's lectures, on several occasions, I can testify that from my standpoint she uses the English language with correctness, with tact and delicacy of manner, and if I had been treated in New York or elsewhere as she seems to have been, I should feel thankful to any editor who would give my friends the use of his columns in my defense.

This is why I have given Cyrus Coolridge and Kate Austin the space in Lucifer that has been accorded to them. I have not set myself in judgment upon the "Truth Seeker" and its editorial management. I have simply tried to put the facts before our readers, allowing all to draw their own conclusions. The "Truth Seeker" is doing its work in its own way, and because its way is not Lucifer's is no reason why there should be contention and strife between us. As Abraham said to Lot: "Let there be no strife between thee and me, for we be brethren." At least we should be so—fellow-workers in a common cause, and that cause the betterment of the world we live in. M. H.

The Herron Divorce and Re-marriage.

A type written letter dated May 4. Anthony Ave., Tremont New York, says:

"MY DEAR MR. HARMAN:—I notice in your issue of April 20, where you give an account of Dr. Herron's domestic troubles, you speak of Miss Carrie Rand as being named 'co-respondent' in the recent divorce case. I am sure you would not intentionally misrepresent the facts of the case, and so I write to tell you—if you have not learned since—and ask that you make correction in your paper, that no charges of anything other than deception were held against Mr. Herron by his wife. Whatever Mr. Herron's private view or public utterances in regard to the present marriage institution, there is nothing in the recent divorce to warrant anyone's being named as 'co-respondent.' I am in a position to know the facts of the case and therefore write you that you may make the needed correction."

No name was signed to this letter, but from internal evidence I have reason to believe that it comes from Franklin H. Wentworth who is Dr. Herron's chief assistant in his New York campaign of education, as he was in the Chicago campaign last winter, and that the omission of the signature was an accidental oversight.

In explanation will say that the statement in regard to the "co-respondent" was taken from a press dispatch dated Grinnell, Iowa, and published in the Chicago dailies. Of course we gladly make any correction of error on our part, provided there be enough in it to be worthy of notice. In this case, however, it is by no means clear that anyone has been injured by the report that Miss Rand was named as "co-respondent" by Mrs. Herron. My impression was that this statement was simply part of the legal formality required by our paternal legislators, judges and lawyers, in order that their previous work in tying people together may be annulled in due form. As explained by Mrs. Herron herself the charge of "desertion" was a mere form—nothing in it—so I reasonably supposed that the naming of Miss Rand as "co-respondent" (if so named) was also a mere matter of form, and that she really did not mean to charge that young person with wrong-doing, in any respect whatever. Now it appears the charge of "adultery" was not made by Mrs. Herron, but if it had been, would it change the moral aspect of the case? Would it absolve the men who administer our governmental machine from the charge of invasive meddlesomeness and of taking blackmail in the shape of fees for such meddlesome invasion of good and peaceable citizens?

The "Chicago American," May 6, contained the following:

"Keokuk, Iowa, May 5.—Authentic information has been received by relatives in this city that the marriage of Miss Carrie Rand to Professor George D. Herron was performed some weeks ago, and that they are now man and wife. . . According to the letter from Mrs. Rand her daughter, Carrie, was married to Mr. Herron within a few days after the divorce decree had been granted to the former Mrs. Herron by the Grinnel court. The ceremony was performed in New York."

After telling us that Mr. and Mrs. Herron have bought a residence in New York, and that they are not going to Europe as was lately reported, we are informed by a dispatch from Reading, Pa., that

"Reading's forty ministers were each requested by a local committee of Socialists to announce from their pulpits today Professor George D. Herron's lecture here on 'Socialism and Liberty,' Wednesday May 15. All refused to comply. The pastors were asked to meet the professor at a reception, but declined. The Socialists tried to get a minister to preside at the lecture, but all refused. The Reading Ministerial Association received an invitation and this has caused great indignation among the members."

Whether it is the Socialistic doctrines of Prof. Herron that caused the hostility of the Ministerial Association of Reading, or his divorce and re-marriage, is not stated, but inasmuch as the clergy are the chief defenders of institutional marriage it is but reasonable to suppose that the last named offense is the chief cause of the ministerial boycott. M. H.

Freedom of Speech Defended.

AN OPEN LETTER TO GEORGE E. MACDONALD BY KATE AUSTIN.

DEAR SIR: Your "inimitable" style is responsible for the direction of this letter. But I politely request that you hand over to the real target, your fastidious brother, Eugene M. Macdonald, any and all benefits which may accrue from the perusal of this letter, trusting that your skill in the art of expressing ideas in words will prevent any shock to that nervous and delicate organism known to the world as editor of the "Truth Seeker."

In his letter of April 1, to the editor of Lucifer, Mr. Macdonald says, in reference to Emma Goldman's lecture on vice before the Manhattan Liberal League, "I killed the report because Miss Goldman's language as reported by Mr. Coolridge, was coarse and vulgar, and about four million subscribers would have jumped on me for publishing it; besides I don't like such talk myself. It seems unnecessary." Last week Mr. George Macdonald gave the substance of Miss Goldman's speech in his inimitable way [George, were you born with this sort of "way," or was it developed in the refined atmosphere of the "Truth Seeker's" sanctum?] and no one has said a word as to its being peculiar. That is the difference between people of the Goldman type and one who knows how to handle the English language."

Now there are two methods of handling the English language—one is using words to conceal ideas; the other is giving expression to ideas by the use of words. Emma Goldman belongs to the small minority who confine themselves strictly to the latter method. If an idea is noble and true, if it tends to widen the mental horizon, and teach men the working of natural laws, it is utterly impossible that the mode of expression be "coarse and vulgar." Vulgarity is imitation of the real, a mockery of the true, and any criticism of this sort must consider first of all the central idea. If this be true, not even the fear of "four million" subscribers should hinder a truth seeking editor from publishing it to the world.

But it seems in this case the fear prevailed, and Adam-like, Editor Macdonald strives to shield himself behind the charge of coarseness and vulgarity, aimed at a woman who dares to express her honest thought of this hypocritical society, a society by the way, which he dare not defend, much less attack.

In the estimation of society Emma Goldman stands today exactly where Thomas Paine stood a century ago. He, too, was called coarse and vulgar and divers other things. There are plenty of weak-kneed freethinkers today who would deny the living Paine under the circumstances of that time. Yet they worship the memory of the noble pioneers who have made the path of free religious investigation safe and respectable. But they are far from being "path-finders" themselves; are loth to extend hospitality to those who are. No! "such talk seems unnecessary;" besides it "aint" safe to give a verbatim report of it, when four million subscribers may have cobwebs in their brains and decidedly object to the "clearing up" process that reason and logic demand. Therefore the wisest plan seems to be to throw the epithets "coarse and vulgar" at the head of a brave woman, who belongs to the advance guard of the Freethought movement, even if to do so is to betray close kinship to the historic animal Christ rode into Jerusalem.

I must tell you, dear brother of the "Truth Seeker" editor, that a number of us were so situated as to be unable to take advantage of your brother's protection, as embodied in your "inimitable" report of Miss Goldman's lecture, and so we read the Coolridge report, and "every last" one of us failed to see anything "peculiar," though, we did find it finally, not in the report, but in Macdonald's letter of explanation to Lucifer. The attempt to make a distinction between "people of the Goldman type" and certain ones "who know how to handle the English language" is "PECULIAR," and a stranger to the facts in the case, would naturally draw inference that the "Goldman type" stood for ignorance and vulgarity. The personality of Emma Goldman gives the lie to any such charge. Her bitterest enemy could not deny her intelligence. The judge who sentenced her to one year in prison on a charge of inciting to riot and was sorry he could not give her five, acknowledged it from the bench and one who applies the term "coarse and vulgar" to Emma simply exposes, not only his ignorance of the proper use of the English language, but of common courtesy as well.

A woman who, in this age of commercial greed, lives true to herself, and expresses her honest convictions regardless of the cost, at least should be spared the slurs of a so-called truth seeker; should be spared having her speech reported by a brother with an "inimitable way." Emma's way is quite good enough for a fearless freethinker.

With no malice, I close this letter, hoping that you will either induce Editor Macdonald to grow a backbone, or to take some step towards having the dictionaries revised and all coarse, vulgar words eliminated, so that we unfortunate beings won't use 'em.

[In my opinion, George Macdonald's words have never justified adverse criticism from any advocate of liberty. In his truly inimitable style he has done wonderfully effective service, and I rejoice in his ability and desire to do this work.

Eugene Macdonald was quite within his rights as editor in declining to publish the report of Emma Goldman's lecture. Whether his explanation and comment thereafter was in good taste, is a matter which each reader must judge for himself. My personal opinion is that the friends of Miss Goldman, of Lucifer, and of liberty, do not advance the cause they champion by the use of harsh and acrimonious criticism and condemnation.—L. H.]

VARIOUS VOICES.

W. R. Britt, Kansas City, Kansas:—I believe yours is the best little paper in the world; its principles just suit me, but there is one thing in our law that I do not like, and that is the law compelling a man to pay for that which he has not ordered. I claim that this is not right. I only asked for a trial subscription and have been waiting for my paper to stop coming, so I would be compelled to renew, because I cannot do without it, and as I do not want something for nothing you will please find enclosed one dollar to apply on Lucifer, but if you expect to keep me as a permanent subscriber you must stop my paper whenever my subscription is out. I also send five cents for extra copies of Lucifer March 23. I have a few lady friends I want to hand that number to. I also enclose $1,50 for the following list of books and pamphlets.

[We find it hard to please all. While a very few censure us for not stopping their Lucifer when time paid for is up, many more thank us for continuing to send it after subscription has expired. Friend Britt is entitled to our thanks for renewal and order for books. M. H.]

W. O. Purvis, Cincinnati, Ohio:—I have been reading your paper off and on for about two years and find very little to criticize—in fact can't see but what I think that way myself. But we all have our hobbies. You are striving to bring about better conditions for women. You are no doubt needed in your place, and so I say, God (if there is any god) speed you!

Brothers Macdonald, Moore, et al, attack the monster superstition as represented by the church.

The W. C. T. U., assisted by Mrs. Carrie Nation, attack the liquor traffic, better known as the "Demon Rum," in their different ways.

Philanthropists all over the country are scheming to abolish poverty, ignorance and crime, all of which is commendable but oh! what a waste of effort, apparently!

You are all lopping off branches, all attacking effects instead of causes. It may be that it is best so, but it does to me seem such a waste or so much misdirected effort. The competitive system under which we are now living, is the foul root from which springs every evil thing that afflicts mankind. Destroy that; destroy it root and branch, and without mercy and you will find that all these evils with which you are battling will die as the branch dies when the root is cut down. From this one root of competition spring

Slavery—Sexual, Chattel and Wage; Ignorance, the mother of superstition; Religion a form of superstition; Poverty, the cause (largely) of ignorance; Drunkenness, the ignorant man's recreation; vice, robbery, lying, etc., etc.

And so, while papers like Lucifer and "The Truth Seeker" are nice to read to a thinker, and to broaden the intellectual horizon, and thus indirectly help to some extent in bringing the day of emancipation nearer, yet you are only lopping off the branches and leaving the poisonous root to send forth its deadly leaves, again, again and again.

[If our friend had said monopoly—privilege, instead of competition, he would have struck much nearer the mark, as I think. Competition is the life of trade, is an old and true proverb. Give us freedom of opportunity—no monopoly, no privilege, then competition is all right; it will then bring progress and happiness to mankind. Especially let us abolish marriage monopoly—the law-made privilege that is given thereby to the few (and denied to the many) to be born well. Give us freedom in love and freedom for motherhood; then as never before in the world's history will humanity begin its "upward climb towards heights sublime." M. H.]

Myra Pepper, Harper, Kansas:—It seems to me there must be some settled meaning for the word "infidel," before we can discuss this question rationally. Quite likely Ella Wheeler Wilcox had in mind a materialistic woman, and if so she is more than half right. Much of our controversies owe their existence to definitions of terms.

Some people call every body who doesn't belong to church—infidel. One may be infidel to the church, a non-believer in creeds, and yet be most spiritually minded. The majority of women are possessors of a degree of spirituality whether they admit it or not, and the wife and mother who recognizes the existence of higher intelligences, whose aspirations and ideals are lofty, expresses more of love than can one who sees nothing beyond the animal plane. Woman, or man either, may claim to believe in a god, or gods, and yet be lacking in the very essentials that go to make up the spiritually minded.

As friend Tucker says—"Infidels have more faith than anybody." They do not pin their faith to any one being, but believe in everything—themselves included. A woman who undertakes the position of stepmother, must have much faith, and happy is she who succeeds in winning the allegiance of the children under her care. Love alone can make it possible.

Adeline Champney, Boston, Mass.:—Here at last is a dollar. I am sending it at once lest urgent needs should cause me to decide that I need it more than you do. It is not from lack of interest that I have not written often to Lucifer, but lack of strength, added to "trouble of my own." I have outworn the first enthusiasm of the new convert, it is true. I am no longer expecting the immediate salvation of the world; indeed I am not at all sanguine that my child will be able to live a free life without paying dearly for his freedom—a half-freedom at that. I have been a hermit this winter, a social nonentity, none-the-less I am sure that there are things worth saying and that I shall some day say some of them. I often think, in reading Lucifer, that I should like to send in a few words frequently in the line of what Lloyd would call the "Higher Free Love"—paragraphs which should be ethical rather than controversial. We radicals do not know how to enjoy freedom, always. To throw off outside interference is just one little first step! Should you care for something of the sort, or are you over-run with friendly contributions?

[We are always glad to hear from our friends and coworkers, and short, crisp paragraphs are always welcome and helpful. If we could afford to publish a sixteen page paper instead of eight, as at present, there would be a much better chance for all to be heard. But send on the paragraphs; we will do our best.]

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

'The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents.

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages, 10 cents.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth. $1.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., No. 19. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, MAY 25, E. M. 301. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE No. 866

WHAT FOUR MEN SAID.

They sat and they talked where the cross-roads meet,
Four men from the four winds come;
And they talked of the horse, for they loved the theme,
And never a man was dumb.
The man from the North loved the strength of the horse,
And the man from the East his pace,
The man from the South loved the speed of the horse,
And the man from the West his grace.

So these four men from the four winds come,
Each paused awhile in his course,
And smiled in the face of his fellow-man
And lovingly talked of the horse.
Then these men parted and went their ways,
As their different courses ran:
And each man journeyed with peace in his heart,
And loving his fellow-man.

They met next year where the cross-roads meet,
Four men from the four winds come;
And it chanced, as they met, that they talked of God,
And never a man was dumb.
One imaged God in the shape of man,
A spirit, did one insist;
One said that Nature herself was God,
One said that he didn't exist.

But they lashed each other with tongues that stung,
That smote as with a rod;
Each glared in the face of his fellow man,
And wrathfully talked of God:
And then they parted and went their ways,
As their different courses ran.
And each man journeyed with war in his heart,
And hating his fellow-man.

Marriage, False and True.

BY J. WM. LLOYD.

With the legal marriage the Dawn-Thinker has no concern. Legal marriage is a legal form, and stands or falls by its own legality. But the true marriage is a spiritual fact, and stands or falls by the real spiritual attitude of the lovers to each other. Where two souls and bodies really fit and answer each other in tender love, there is the real marriage where they conjoin without this fitness there is adultery, and when this fitness fails there is divorce. And this without regard to the legal or illegal pronunciamento. It is with marriage as with all things else. The law establishes only the artificial, the so-called; it has no power to create the real, no jurisdiction in the realm of spirit, no recognition in nature. The attempt to marry by law is like the attempt to make royalty, nobility, manners, and the rest, by law. The true King is not created by such clumsy tools as crowns and thrones, but is such by the majesty of his own soul; the true nobleman is the noble man, the truly polite are those who respect liberty and are kind. The law can create nothing but a form; it is helpless to help marriage, it can only usurp and interfere. By no possibility can it make a true union more beautiful, pure, and sweet, but it can call away attention from its spiritual essence to emphasize a formula: it can externally vulgarize it; it can externally prevent it; it can license or even compel an adulterous union, and it can compel an adulterous union to stand, and prevent its natural correction, which is the immediate secession of the parties. The conjunction of the incompatible is the true adultery, and is condemned as such in every kingdom and province of Nature. Divorce or suffer is the law.

The true marriage is the holiest and most religious thing in the universe, and all caresses of all lovers are perfect in proportion to the religious depth and sincerity of their moving impulse. The lighter, sportive expressions of love are certainly delightful and, in their time and place, most innocent, but they do not satisfy; only the moving of the whole soul to its foundations in a deep, solemn, devoted love can satisfy. And particularly every woman feels this, because she is peculiarly the agent of love and religion. The woman, however base or fallen, who does not secretly worship the "grand passion," as her intensest aspiration and holiest ideal, is a woman in form merely, not in spirit.

The relations of lovers are the most sacred and private things in all the world. Their love, caresses, and union are the "holy of holies," and the vulgarity and profanation of public interference with their relations, except by their express permission or request, is not to be exceeded by any sacrilege. If they themselves profane themselves, either spiritually or physically, in this their temple, that is their own saving sin, which shall by contrast show them the right.

More About the Press-Writers. No. III.

BY FRANCIS B. LIVESEY.

A prominent Press-Writer wrote me. Here is the dialogue:

P. P.: How do you get your sheets of articles reprinted?

L.: Cullingford and Diehl, 21 South Seventh Street Philadelphia, do it for me. Mr. Cullingford is a Freethinker and solicits such work.

P. P. Have you an arrangement with some papers to furnish you sheets from the type of your articles? If so, what sort of terms can you make?

L.: Occasionally a paper agrees to do this, giving us our articles or letters at from one-half to three-quarters of the regular price. Many have found that these sheets, leaflets or circulars do good service in many ways.

2. Otto Wettstein, Rochelle, Ill., says he would like Mr. Groh or me to induce one of the New York or Chicago great dailies to give the Press-Writers regular space. Well, if I see an opening I will do my part. Not long since the "Boston Globe" was advertising itself along a line that admitted of a suggestion in behalf of Press-Writers. I availed of it and since then have seen more Press-Writers in the "Globe" than ever before. The Chicago "Record-Herald" is a likely paper. Letters it has lately given have been honored with the same distinctions as its press dispatches generally. I would suggest a petition sent to this paper, signed by Chicago and other Liberals.

3. Mr. Wettstein writes me he has had poor success in getting in the papers. He is too deep, too philosophical. Let him give what he would deem the crumbs of his thought. Let him watch the tide of events and float in his ideas in connection with them. This is the secret of getting in the secular papers. They want principles always interwoven with news. This makes things newsy and at the same time easily understood. I used to have my letters returned by friendly editors with instructions to simplify them. I ate humble pie, did so, and got published. No one has to tell me that now-a-days.

4. A lively discussion has been started in the Philadelphia "Evening Telegraph" between Mr. Stern and Mr. Groh. Discussions are too often cut short by the editors. To hold space, it is well for the writers to always prerent new points. Mr. Grob was in the "Telegraph" on May 9 and Mr. Stern on the 10th. Mr. Stern, by the by, attacked the New York "Truth Seeker" with all the fervor of Kate Austin. The friends of Ingersoll will also feel aggrieved over his reference to him. Let them try the "Telegraph," addressing their letters, Barclay H. Warburton, President of "The Evening Telegraph."

5. The secular papers state that Mr. Reichwaid and other Chicago Liberals are arranging to build a "temple" to the memory of Ingersoll. A theater was always good enough for him in his life, and if he had been partial to temples, like Mrs. Eddy, he would have undertaken one or more, as she has. Liberals are altogether too poor to think of such a thing. If it so happens that some of them have more cash for the cause than we are aware of, and can raise $100,000, let them at once form a combine of the Liberal papers and give us an aggressive and fighting sheet. Like the Ingersoll monument movement, the Ingersoll temple movement must die. It is useless to attempt the impractical and the impossible. Temples stand for either Paganism or false Christianity, and Freethought, "whose temple is all space," needs them not. Frederic Dahlstrom, 43 VanBuren street, and Samuel Roberts of Englewood are with Mr. Reic wald as incorporators. Don't! gentlemen, don't!

6. William Carter, of Ansonia, Conn., was released from the New Haven jail on May 9, where he had been for twenty-one months for refusing to pay a military tax. His release follows an excitement over his case that followed my attention to it in the press. The Peace Societies of his and other states knew nothing of his case until I called their attention to it. Thus we see how superior Press-Writers are to organized pompous bodies. Carter was carrying out the idea of Tolstoy, who says that the first step toward universal peace is for individuals to refuse to bear arms or to contribute to war funds. William Kershaw, 149 Franklin street, Fall River, Mass., has also undergone long imprisonment for his refusal to pay a poll tax. The Providence "Journal" of March 29, last, gave a vindication of him. He should be sustained by those believing as he does. I wrote Ernest H. Crosby in relation to Carter, believing that he would gladly rush to the aid of the only man known to be carrying out the doctrine of the Tolstoy he loves so well; but I did not hear that he put in an appearance.

7. One of the Press-Writers says: "I am not in full sympathy with the sentiments of Lucifer, having drawn a capital prize in the matrimonial lottery." I would like to ask this Brother, as I would many other ardent Freethinkers, why it is that they have to pay their respects to what the clergy call "the Christian institution of marriage" before they can love, respect and familiarize themselves with the opposite sex?

8. Bolton Hall, of New York, Charles H. Kerr, 56 Fifth Av., Chicago, and others have long been urging me to show some appreciation of Prof. Herron, on the grounds that he was all the church iconoclast that I could conceive of. I refused, simply because I saw the Professor patted on the shoulder by ministers everywhere, and I knew he could not be a hale fellow well met with that class and at the same time be pulling down their churches with the hand of an iconoclast. Now, however, that he is being repudiated by the clergy of the country as a moral outlaw, I have felt it my duty to write to many papers a word in his defense, and called on Bolton Hall and his brethren to do likewise. Bolton excused himself and I have no doubt the rest of the Professor's friends have likewise. I also wrote to Miss Carrie Rand, Grinnell, Iowa, and gave her my opinion of the course she should pursue to perpetuate her love for the professor and disseminate his doctrines.

9. The persecuted Doukhobors should take up their abode at Home, Washington. The Anarchists there believe in absolute liberty of belief and practice, until the latter directly interferes with the rights of another. The Philadelphia "Record" says of the Doukhobors: "The sexes live together as long as they have inclination, and take new mates and cast off old ones with as little concern as the 'wanton lapwings.' The custom is a matter of conscience with the Doukhobors." This, with the entire article, was republished in the staid, old "Baltimore Sun," under the heading of "Religious Free Lovers." The most amusing thing about this Doukhobor revelation is the connection the Society of Friends have had with them. What the virgins, matrons and "purists" of this society now think of the Doukhobors, would be interesting to know. They sent their virgins out among them to teach them love for the Bible and sundry civilized requirements. This paper, the "Friend's Intelligence," Box 924, Philadelphia, has devoted whole pages to the sect and raised large sums for their assistance. Now that they are the freest of the free in love affairs what are the Friends going to do about it? I have addressed them on the subject, but received no reply. The fact is the Doukhobors take the Christian view of love. They know that Jesus and his apostles neither married any couples, nor gave any direction for marriage. Their religion teaches them to make as little fuss as possible over what the world deems its greatest excitements. Their whole lives are better and more substantial than those of the sects given to large attention to marriage ceremonies, and any country that possesses them should feel blessed by the possession—they are the sturdy workers and the back-bone of any land. Prof. Herron and I think that marriage is altogether a superfluous ceremony between "two hearts that beat as one," and that, with heaven cognizant of the fact, man's ceremonials are unnecessary. If we had conscientious compunctions on the question, of course we would suffer banishment before we would submit.

10. The Hearst syndicated papers gave on May 12 an article against Socialism, by James Creelman, and a poem in favor of it by Ella Wheeler Wilcox. I tell them the public schools are continually preparing 16,000,000 young people to ask for food, clothing and shelter later in life on the same principle that they received education. Socialists boast that the public schools prepare people for their theory, and the post-office illustrates its running order. For myself, I must say that the postoffice needs some conscientious men in it. The amount of first and third class matter that is delayed and lost now-a-days is something beyond all precedent. I suffer greatly in this line myself and I hear from others who do also. As the time for Socialists to rule seems to be approaching, we must here ask them what they are going to do on the question of free mails? Can they say that one of their first responses will be the obliteration of Comstockism in all its details? Let them answer this at once.

11. So great has been the slanders heaped upon William Hannibal Thomas, of Everett, Mass., author of the "American Negro," that preparations were being made to prosecute his slanderers. I immediately wrote him that the pen of a genius was mightier than the law and that he should first attempt the confusion of his enemies by that method. I gave him a list of newspapers and he has accepted my suggestion. In the Martinsburg, West Va., "Pioneer Press" of May 18 are some letters he wrote me and kindred matter. He is a gentleman and scholar and should receive attention from all who love justice, truth and superior Negro.

12. Press Writers and workers who are interested in my anti-public school work will be interested in reading the Cincinnati "Public School Journal" henceforth. Beginning with its June issue I expect to have some long articles in it. The editor, John Butler, has been highly pleased with some effusions I have sent him, and being a thorough believer in "free press," he allows me free rein, letting professors and school teachers accept it as they may. The fact that one of the very oldest school papers should thus open its columns to me is significant. It shows that I have gained by learning to labor and to wait, and it should give hope to other Press-Writers in other lines for other papers.

13. A. C. Armstrong, 17 Leroy street, Dorchester, Mass., seems to have connived with Chas D. McBride, Samoth, Ill., for the spread of the Press-Writers. Mr. Armstrong has a letter in Boston "Banner of Light," of May 4, calling attention to the work of the "American Press-Writers' Association," shrewdly basing his letter on some previous inclinations in the line in the "Banner." That is the proper caper. Mr. A. says he never attended school in his life. That's greatly to his credit and makes it possible that he may yet become a literary genius. His letters in the Boston "Globe," "Traveler" and other large dailies are strong. J. T. Small, Provincetown, Mass., has also written to some English radical papers depicting the advantages accuring from the Press-Writers' Association. After awhile it will be international. Spread it out, Brothers!

14. The attempt to suppress Single Tax "free speech" in Detroit City was an outrage. Is it possible that the peaceable Single Taxers are getting mixed up with the Anarchists because they defended the latter in Philadelphia? Both are peaceable and are entitled to unlimited free speech. The Taxers know how to write and they should flood the Detroit papers in their defense. I formerly opposed the Taxers, but this persecution cements me to them. I call upon all reformers to drop all differences when "free speech" and "free press" are threatened and stand solidly against the oppressors. This is our very first duty at all times. The Taxers risked everything to do this in behalf of Emma Goldman in Philadelphia. Let us reciprocate. Suppression for one party means danger to all.

15. Some new and valued Press-Writers are Walter C. Faye, Box 896, Lincoln, Neb.; James B. Elliott, 3515 Wallace street, Philadelphia; Alfred Cridge, 429 Montgomery street, San Francisco, and Dr. A. L. Astor, Cor. Summit and Cameron streets, East Oakland, Calif.

16. An exquisite performance, to my mind, was that of T. A. Kinghorn-Jones in "Discontent" (Home, Wash.) of May 1. He lives at 26 Geary street, San Franci co, and called upon the postal authorities to arrest the Examiner for "obscenity." He did this to prove that big concerns are not bothered, while little papers like "Discontent" are. The postal authorities refused to prosecute, while, if "obscenity" was printed anywhere, the "Examiner" was the only one that gave evidence of it. These little practical efforts are worth volumes, and I trust the Press-Writers will devise and employ them. My brain is continually full of them.

Thomas Paine.

BY J. B. ELLIOTT.

Next year will be the one hundredth anniversary of Paine's return to America. It seems to me that the Paine admirers ought to make an extra effort to celebrate the occasion by some special feature.

Strange as it may appear, while Franklin's, Washington's and Jefferson's portraits have appeared in every shape upon the paper and metallic money of the United States and upon the postage stamps, Paine has been neglected.

Even in the school histories his name is omitted in the history of the American Revolution, and the rising generation will know nothing of his existence.

There are Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Browning Whitman, Shelley Societies. But alas! No Paine society until now to do justice historically to Paine's work in behalf of human liberty. Even his "Common Sense" has been omitted in Independence Hall. Think of it! the leading pamphlet of the American Revolution. No wonder the Liberty Bell is silent.

I enclose you copy of the aims and objects of the society, and hope the readers of the Light-Bearer will send ten cents for more light and the portrait of Thomas Paine presented by Major Taylor to Independence Hall.

Mr. Taylor spent three hundred dollars of his own money in addition to sixteen years of hard fighting with the Christian bigotry that existed in Philadelphia when the portrait of Paine was presented. It seems that the work of the society rests upon a few members. I have tried to give the public the best work that could be had. I hope my efforts will be appreciated by those who are judges.

3525 Wallace, St., Philadelphia, Pa., May 16.

Another Freshman.

BY TSENRE.

My experience does not agree with either May Huntley or the editor. Those that I have loved I still love, living or dead. The reason so many lovers fall out is that they expect too much of each other. While it may be true, in a degree, that it always is a case of loved and lover, each must sink their own individuality and be mutually thankful that love has come to them. To my mind the Egoists kill love, for they are so wedded to their philosophy that love jumps out of the window before my two egoists can state their different individualities. As I do not expect perfect men and women I've never seen absolute perfection, but I have seen ideal love and experienced some of it. Of course I did not seek a heart to beat entirely for me, nor did I think to give an unchanging magnetism that would be a "fount of every bliss."

May and Moses have not discarded the unscientific ideals of the past. Freedom will give us more sense and more love, and will let the lovers love—in books and in life.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

Our Public Schools.

One of the greatest dangers to human liberty and justice in this country is the institution known as the public school. Next to the enslavement of the mothers in and by institutional marriage, is the training received by the young in the state-socialistic public school, in what is called "patriotism,"—in lessons of obedience to the "constituted authorities," which means, in short, obedience to the men who own and run the public utilities, the public franchises, the trusts, including, of course, the all-embracing trust, the general government.

Not often is this very uncomfortable truth brought to view in a public print, so boldly, so unblushingly as was lately done in one or two editorials of the very popular "Chicago American." While speaking of the falling off of the birth rate in the New England states the following language was used:

"Therefore if we want to save America from the national death that is threatened by the decline in the native birth rate we must keep our institutions in such vigor that they can assimilate the foreign immigrants and their children, and turn what otherwise would swamp our nationality into a means of its preservation. And the most powerful of all the agencies working toward that end is the public school system. The public schools are useful—indeed necessary—for the production of intelligent citizens. That is an important work, but it is trivial compared with the supreme work of preserving the American nationality. This is in the most literal sense a matter of life or death. It is a question not merely whether we shall have intelligent Americans, but whether we shall have any Americans at all. As long as our splendid school system continues to bring up our children of all nationalities in the traditions of American principles and American patriotism the republic will be safe. And it can be saved in no other way."

According to this writer the production of intelligent citizens is a "trivial" matter as "compared to the supreme work of preserving the American nationality." That is to say, the governmental machine is of infinitely greater importance than the individual citizens. The "republic" must live though all the people perish—perish for lack of knowledge.

But when searched for, where and what do we find the republic to be? We find women, men and children, but the THING, the entity, called the republic is nowhere to be found except, except, in the personalities of the MEN who make and administer the body of laws.

King Louis of France said, "I am the state!" With equal truth and propriety William McKinley and the other heads of the so-called "co-ordinate" departments of the invisible, intangible thing called government, constitute the American Republic, and behind these visible and tangible representatives of the state, stand the men who in all ages, and under all forms of government, constitute the "power behind the throne greater than the throne itself," namely, the owners of accumulated wealth—the capitalists of the country, including, of course, the various priesthoods of God and of Mammon—the bankers, the money lords, and also the guardians of the countless millions invested in churches, parsonages, nunneries, church schools and hospitals, etc., etc.

"An Age of Aggression."

"The old prophets are dead and the young ones are all liars," saith the proverb. But is this a true saying? If mankind ever possessed the gift of prophecy, the power of forecasting the future—why should it not possess such power now?

Among the younger prophets is Fred Burry, publisher of "Fred Burry's Journal," Toronto Canada. Like Helen Wilmans and a host of others scarcely less known to the reading public, Mr. Burry is one of the "I Ams," one of the "Creators." "We are creators," says Mr. Burry. "The 'I' is God. The Human Will is the Supreme Power of Nature. . . . . I am God. . . . . I stand secure, my own creator, my own master, my own redeemer."

Among the prophecies of this daring young Individualist is the following:

"In many respects this may be said to be an age of aggression. Humanity is entering upon a new plane of activity—a new ideal of life is born. Old institutions, which have served their time, are being thrown aside. The spirit of iconoclasm is in the air—we feel the need of displacing the old with the new.

"In the near future there will be many more sweeping changes than the world has yet undergone. We have so far only been experimenting. We must now be more direct and thorough in our work.

"The advanced thinkers of the age are breaking away from the limitations of churches, schools and similar binding institutions. More and more is the dignity of the Individual being recognized. Towering aloft is the banner of independence. Freedom of thought and action for every man is the demand of today."

Yes, as never before, perhaps, in the history of our planet, the demand for freedom of thought and freedom of action for every man and every woman, is becoming common and even popular, notwithstanding the efforts of churchmen, kings, and political leaders to hold their dupes submissive, by threats of punishment and promises of reward. The excommunication and banishment of Tolstoi, the Russian prophet, and the attempt to crush such daring iconoclasts as George D. Herron in this country, are a few only of the pointers showing how wide spread and formidable is the revolt of "the advanced thinkers of the age" against "the limitations of churches, schools and similar binding institutions."

The Press Writers' Club.

Francis B. Livesey gives us another installment of matters pertaining to the Press Writers and their work. That the idea of systematic work in this line is growing, is shown by the tone of letters published in many of the large city dailies, as well as in the weekly press of the country. Instead of the old stereotyped subjects,—the weather and the crops, the money question, free trade, foreign immigration, etc., etc., found in the correspondence columns of these secular journals we now have an occasional protest against the established order of things, such as the following letter published in a recent "Chicago American:"

"A great deal of unjust criticism has been heaped upon George D. Herron in connection with his divorce and heresy trial. In considering many of those who have made foolish attacks upon him one is reminded of the dog that bayed at the moon. In reality there is nothing immoral in Professor Herron being divorced and marrying again. And the fact of the children in the case makes the divorce all the more moral.

"Imagine the demoralizing influence that is brought to bear on the character of a child in growing to manhood or womanhood subjected to the example of quarrelsome and ill-mated parents. In the formative period of a child's life it partakes largely of the traits that impress themselves upon its immediate experience and observation.

"It often happens that a man and woman marry, who at the time of marriage are congenial as to tastes and temperament. But should one of them develop along lines of culture that broaden the mind and open up new vistas of thought and ambition while the other remains stupid or mediocre and unappreciative of the other's higher qualities there is sure to be trouble in that household. To travel smoothly over life's highway it is necessary that both husband and wife remain stupid and mediocre and commonplace or else both advance in the development of a larger and broader life. It must be an awful hell—the fate of either a progressive man or woman to be bound for life to a stupid, unenlightened husband or wife."

Book Notices.

THE RIGHT OF THE CHILD TO BE WELL BORN.

This is the title of a well-printed booklet of twenty-two pages written by Rev. Mabel MacCoy Irwin, of Boston, published by the National Purity Association, 96-5th Ave., Chicago, price one dime. Although written by a clergy-woman, one who apparently clings to much of the old-time religious dogma, this booklet shows that its author is a rebel against the teachings of Moses and of Paul in the matter of woman in the conjugal or marital relation. A few paragraphs will illustrate the trend and animus better than any comment of mine:

"The general belief of our women—which amounts almost to a religion—that the relation between husband and wife is a necessity on his part and a duty on hers, is one of the most false, pernicious and far-reaching in its power to destroy health and happiness that has ever been conceived by the mind of man. It is an outrage upon her and a libel upon him. As if woman's humiliation could be man's necessity! The mistaken sense of duty on her part and necessity on his is the miserable serpent that enters into the Eden of marriage and poisons all things sweet and pure, driving the man and woman out of their garden, in which grow all things pleasant, to wander in the dry deserts of dissatisfaction, disappointment, and disgust. With their minds filled with these false notions, the newly married begin the making of a miniature world handicapped to failure from the start.

"The right of a woman to say when she will become a mother appeals to all fair-minded people as self-evident. As Dr. J. H. Dewey so ably puts it: 'Since the function and burden of maternity belong to woman, she must be recognized as the rightful and absolute queen in and over this realm, even as man is king in his—the glory of which is royal ministry and service, not demand. The privileges and conditions of motherhood are sacred to woman, and must be left absolutely to her divine instincts, or intuitions.' Selfish indulgence on the part of the husband is the consummation of the lust of animal desire, and, whether in or out of wedlock, is prostitution.

"In the history of the Race, woman—for the most part—has considered herself the property of or adjunct to her husband. As wife she has considered herself entitled to no individuality.

"The masculine part of humanity through theological, legal and social edicts has decreed that 'Woman was made for man,' and she, though with oft-repeated rebellion, has accepted the decree. Her sons have nursed it with their milk and perpetuated it from generation to generation. As a sex she has been crushed from the beginning; but as a recent writer reminds us—'She has been crushed upward,' till at last she begins to see that man and woman were made for each other and that their interests are identical. We must not forget that man on his part has been quite as falsely taught as woman on hers.

"But despite all false teachings the race has surely, though painfully, evolved. Today both enslaver and enslaved are coming to see that marriage means larger freedom and not bondage, and that only in free womanhood consecrated to motherhood lies the hope of the Race. Man will follow where woman leads. When she knows her rightful position, and with sweet womanliness takes it, she will find him at her side to aid and abet in all that pertains to the uplift of humanity."

HOME CYCLOPEDIA OF POPULAR MEDICAL, SOCIAL AND SEXUAL SCIENCE, by Edward B. Foote, M. D., profusely illustrated 1248 pages, price $2. New York: Murray Hill Publishing Co., 129 East 28th Street, and L. N. Fowler & Co., 7 Imperial Arcade, Ludgate Circus, London, E. C. England.

The author of the popular work entitled "Plain Home Talk and Medical Common Sense," has interpolated the contents of that volume with over 500 pages of new and intensely interesting matter which comes out with a new title—"Dr. Foote's Home Cyclopedia." It well deserves that name, for it is a veritable cyclopedia of information upon all subjects relating to the welfare of the human family. It treats upon every subject that can be thought of bearing upon health and the physical regeneration of mankind. Its 256 recipes have their value, but its hygienic advice is of even more value, and of still greater importance is its instruction upon how to effectually introduce race culture. A way to weed out physical infirmities and mental disorders has occupied the minds of scientists for many centuries, and no practical plan has ever been presented until now. Dr. Foote gives a comprehensive plan, which seems to be practical, and that, too, without interfering with the rights of the individual. This, and all the subjects treated in the book, are presented in language which may be understood by the illiterate as well as the professional mind. The author has a wonderful faculty of presenting the most abstruse subjects in a way to be perfectly understood by the lay reader. A full index is given in the closing pages of the work so that reference can be made on the moment to whatever advice the reader desires to look on. It is certainly a valuable work for the home, and should find its way upon the shelves of every family medical closet, if not upon those of the library.

Do You Like South Dakota?

A subscriber living in South Dakota writes: "If among your friends there is a carpenter who would like to come here and do day work, have him write to me. I have two barns to build, also other work. If he has a family he would like to bring away from the city I could furnish him a home on a farm near the work.

"I also want to find a free couple, or two or three couples, who would like to rent a farm. Would like one married couple and several other persons, all free people, who want to locate on a farm, and who like South Dakota. Conditions here are fine, and lots of people coming from Illinois and Iowa. With a man and wife for a starter, I can locate five or six others on same farm and arrange so all work for themselves but live collectively, thus avoiding the unpleasant isolation and unnecessary investments incident to conventional farm life.

"I also desire to correspond with an able architect who is a free man." We will forward letters for those desiring further particulars. Inclose stamp for postage.

Emma Goldman in Chicago.

Sunday afternoon, at 3:30 May 26, Emma Goldman of New York, will speak before the Society of Anthropology, in Oriental Hall, Masonic Temple, on the "Modern Phases of Anarchism." The many friends and admirers of this fearless and able champion of freedom and justice will doubtless be present to give her and her address a suitable reception. On Saturday evening May 25, Miss Goldman will speak at 105 Wells street, before the Blacksmiths' Union. Subject not named.

Comment—Various.

"AS IF BABIES WERE CABBAGES."

In her reply last week to "Medicus," H. C. G. thinks people treat the subject of heredity as if "babies were a lot of cabbages." While it is true, no doubt, that comparisons and anologies may be pushed to irrational extremes yet it is also well to remember that in many respects babies are like cabbages, like stalks of corn, or young oaks. In all these success depends on good seed, good soil, right temperature, sufficient moisture, air, sunlight and room to grow. Yes, it is well to remember that babies are products of nature, products of heredity and environment, no less than are garden vegetables, calves, pigs, colts or young canines, about the pedigrees and early training of which our gardeners and live stock fanciers are so very careful.

GREETINGS FROM PARIS.

From the capital of France comes to us a brave and ably conducted little journal called "Regeneration." From editorials in this paper we learn that the French Capital has its organizations for meddling with other people's business, under pretext of protecting virtue and preventing or suppressing vice. A friend has kindly translated for us the following paragraphs from a late issue of "Regeneration," copies of which can be obtained by addressing the editor and publisher, Paul Robin, 6 Rue Haxo, Paris, France:

"Our Tartuffes of purity have gone to America for the villainous law of March 16, 1898, enacted under the pretence of protecting the innocence of young women employed in the post-office and of other young women who are certainly not such fools as these professional puritans suppose them to be or wish to make them.

"It is in America also that we find the most daring rebels. There is that zealous weekly paper, Lucifer, in Chicago, which is battling for the liberty of all humanity, and notably for sexual liberty. Its editor, Moses Harman, has been persecuted many years and has spent one year in prison for the circulation of 'obscene literature'—that is the name given by the despots of the land of reputed liberty, as well as here, to the discussion of prudence in procreation. Many other American journals, notably 'Free Society,' and 'Discontent,' are following in the way paved by Lucifer.

"In spite of the most incredible annoyance by the police, the campaign is continuing by speech as well as in the press. Lucifer mentions a fact, which is as important in America as it would be in France to record the conversion of Sebastian Faure to our cause, or that Jaures had taken a stand for personal liberty.

"For twenty five or thirty years Robert G. Ingersoll has been a splendid propagandist of religious and political liberty both in England and in America. It was only recently, shortly before his death, that he took a stand practically in favor of sexual liberty and free motherhood."

"Regeneration" then goes on to give a French translation of the following passage from Colonel Ingersoll's address on "What is Religion", which was printed in Lucifer a few months ago:

"There is but one hope. Ignorance, poverty, and vice must stop populating the world. This cannot be done by moral suasion. This cannot be done by talk or example. This cannot be done by religion or by law, by priest or hangman. This cannot be done by force, physical or moral. To accomplish this there is but one way. Science must make woman the owner, the mistress of herself. Science, the only possible savior of mankind, must put it in the power of woman to decide for herself whether she will or will not become a mother. This is the solution of the whole question."

Every generation laughs at the old fashions, but follows religiously the new.—Thoreau.

VARIOUS VOICES.

R. B. Kerr, Phenix, B. C., Canada:—I enclose $5. Please credit $1 on our annual subscription, and send Lucifer for two years to Mrs. J. D., Liscard, England. Have been too busy to write to you or anyone else. I hope Lillian is well, and am sorry we never hear from her now in Lucifer.

R. F. L., Friday Harbor, Wash.:—Enclosed fifty cents to pay my subscription for six months as I see my time was out sometime ago, and I have been afraid you would stop sending Lucifer. I would like to shake hands with you. You have helped me more than I can tell. I have been sending out some of your literature and distributing leaflets. But nearly everyone is so used to things as they are that they don't want a change. I would like to meet some of your readers (Freethinkers) as I have never had that pleasure yet. Or would like to receive letters from them, especially from Washingtonians. I did not write this for publication, though you may use it if you think best withholding my name of course.

Mount up the heights of wisdom and crush each error low.
Keep back no word of knowledge that human hearts should know.

[If any of our readers would like to correspond with our subscriber at Friday Harbor, Wash., we will forward their letters to him if sent in our care.]

R. R. F.:—Persons who have worked for wages all their lives and are still about as poor as when they were born could could-better their condition by attending an industrial boarding school, learning to live collectively, learning to cultivate ground, care for live stock, etc.: taking stock in the company for their surplus products. After five years of this life they would be ahead what they had learned, and the value of their stock in the company as well; whereas they are ahead nothing now for all the work they have ever done.

How is this for an idea? Is this a good solution of the "Capital versus Labor" question? Economically dependent mothers breed slave wives, wage laborers and tramps. Capital speculates from wage labor. The industrial boarding school heads all of this off by teaching economic independence to both sexes. Boys and girls educated to live collectively and work for themselves at farm industries can also form stock companies, and operate factories by their own labor. This would be a dead freeze-out to the capitalist manufacturer.

Of course adult laborers, like adult wives, do not want to be emancipated. Laborers want to go on a strike and riot and bring the old fellow who gives them a job to their terms. Wives likewise go on a strike to bring those mean old cusses (their husbands) to terms. Not much hope to transform adults. But start at infancy, rear them on a baby farm and in an industrial boarding school located on a farm and we shall have a new and well-formed humanity. Orphans and illegitimates will thus form the greater part of our newer and better humanity.

J. S. Odegaarde, Marcus, Wash.:—To a man up a tree 'tis an exceedingly funny world, and I think that I can without fear of logical contradiction assert that the world's monarchial rulers are nearly all cowards while their subjects are mostly fools. The Sultan of Turkey fears to occupy his throne during an earthquake, and his subjects are soothed by a prayer from the Koran. The Czar of Russia lives in seclusion, and great consternation is caused in Moscow because ninety students left the university on a mission to preach Socialism in the country. And Cousin Willie Hohenzollern got scared nearly to death the other day because some one threw a piece of scrap iron at him, and now he seems to have lost all faith in God and puts all his trust in the army.

And now is a real live Anarchist driven out of Monarchial Canada—see enclosed clippings—across the international line into the states and still the Republic lives. Verily Monarchies must be suffering from some nervous prostration superinduced either from old age or corruption, or possibly a guilty knowledge that they are wrong and fear public opinion, a free press, lest they be found out.

One thing is sure; those in authority have no faith in either God or the people they rule; while I also think that the people to a large extent are beginning to lose faith in their rulers. But from Monarchism to Anarchism is too big a step even for a progressive (?) Britisher and they are no more capable of understanding the philosophy of Anarchism than would the subjects of the Sultan who believe in prayers as a preventive for earthquakes.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jean-nette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

By Grant Allen. "The Old Asceticism said: 'Be Virtuous and You Will Be Happy.' The New Hedonism says: 'Be Happy and You Will Be Virtuous.'" This is the key note of Grant Allen's Masterpiece. 30 large pages, five cents For sale at this office.

WANTED: A COMPANION! I have a correspondent who desires a business partner, an intelligent companion, and a sweetheart, all in one. Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says. 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers; 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Cloth. $1.

A Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

HELEN WILMANS,

Who has tested her ideas and is now reaping a rich reward from them financially, has written out the secret of her success and printed it in a book called "THE CONQUEST OF POVERTY." Forty thousand copies of which sold before it was fairly off the press. Paper 50 cents. Address Freedom Publishing Co., Sea Breeze, Florida.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., No. 20. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, JUNE 1, E. M. 301 [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE No. 867

LITTLE HUMAN ACORNS.

I saw an acorn lying on a rock
  On which the sun beat down its fiery glance
The tiny seedling, though of royal stock,
  Lay dying neath the frown of circumstance,
And sun and wind united in the strife
  To cancel Nature's title-deed to life.

A common acorn? Nay, for in its breast
  There lay the germ-leaf of the mighty tree,
The infant oak stirred faintly in its rest
  And gasped for nourishment and liberty,
And these denied, the shriveling prison-cell
  Crushed back the aspiring life within its shell.

A sense of pity seized me as I gazed
  Upon the oakhood's premature decay,
And with the hand of comradeship I raised
  It from the rock and thrust it in the clay:
For no true man the duty could avoid,
  When acorns blasted are great acorns destroyed.

Toward city streets I turned my foot-steps soon,
  And saw upon the corner of a street,
A newsboy standing near a thronged saloon,
  Uncouth in garment, and with naked feet,
Whose energies went out in frantic strains
To keep alive upon his paltry gains.

Upon the barren rock of business lay
  This baby prophecy of future man,
Plucked from the cradle of its native clay
  And thrust beneath the curse of social ban,
The acorn's simile reminded then
That forms of infants hold the souls of men.

These human acorns lie on every side,
  With all the chance of greatness—and of death.
Upon the cross of commerce crucified,
  They pray to us with each expiring breath,
Can we do less than I did in the wood—
Give them the soil of social brotherhood?

Pre-Natal Culture.

BY TENNIE C. CLAFLIN.*

We have often wondered that, among all the medical authorities, there have not been more who devoted some part of their profuse writings to the ante-natal care and treatment of children. No more important addition could be made to our system of social economy, nor to our pathological literature, than a strictly scientific analysis of fœtal life for popular and familiar circulation. While so much has been said and written—much of which, to be sure, is very foolish and unprofitable—regarding children's care and treatment after birth, that part of their life previously has been entirely ignored. It would be just as proper to ignore their life after birth until some still future period, say three, five or seven years of age, as to do so previously.

To lay a good foundation for a good life, it is required that the proper care should be bestowed upon it from its very point of beginning. The same rule should apply and govern, which applies and governs in all similar matters outside of and below the most important of them all. Even the tiller of the soil exercises special care and his best wisdom in the matter of preparation for the future harvest. He knows, from oft-repeated experience, how important it is, first of all, to have the very best seed, of the very best variety, to plant. For this he selects the choicest and most perfect of his preceding crop, or purchases from others who have better than he. He knows that seed thus selected, planted side by side with unselected seed, and receiving no more care, will yield not only larger harvests but also that they will be of choice quality.

Having obtained the best seed possible, his next step is to have the ground properly prepared, into which, at just the proper season, he deposits it. All these introductory and preparatory measures of care and study are a part of the process by which our fruits, grains and vegetables have been brought to their present state of perfection. Everybody knows that fruits and vegetables which grow wild and are poisonous, are oftentimes capable of being brought, by cultivation, to be useful and delicious articles of diet. Everybody knows that it has been only by the strictest study and care that our most celebrated breeds of horses and other stocks of domesticated animals have been obtained. Everybody knows that deep scientific research is constantly being made regarding almost every department of production, and that those engaged in the respective departments, eagerly seek and systematically apply every new fact that which science makes clear. And it is, scientifically, an admitted fact, that the future character of what is to be produced can be very nearly, if not absolutely, determined by those who have charge of the process through which it is to be produced. Even the color which the herdsman desires for his cattle can be literally obtained; and what is true regarding color is just as broadly true regarding all other indices of individuality.

Notwithstanding all these accepted facts which are coming to be the rules and guides so general in their application to include children, the world stands aghast, and, with one united effort, frowns it down.

Nobody denies the importance of the subject, but those who will speak at all argue that it is one of those things which the common mind is not prepared to meet. Not prepared to meet! And the whole Christian world has been preaching regeneration these eighteen hundred years! whichthey tell us is the one thing necessary. All the importance claimed for regeneration we willingly admit; all badly produced persons require regeneration; but as to it being the main thing, we beg to demur. If regeneration is an important matter, generation is still more so. It is to the consideration of this scientific fact, as demonstrated and practiced by the human, in all departments of nature below, that the human must come, and acknowledge itself a proper subject of. Just so far as science can demonstrate and humanity will put its demonstrations to practice, just so far will the necessity for regeneration be done away.

It is too true that the courage to face this question has always been wanting, and that when it is attempted, all society pretends to be outraged by it. Are Human Beings, then, to always be considered of so much less importance than the very things they make subservient to them, that they should forever be left to come into this world's existence as individuals at random? We know the obloquy that has fallen upon all who have ever attempted to hold the mirror so that society would be obliged to contemplate itself; but, notwithstanding all this, we feel there is not a more noble object to which we can turn. We have deliberately considered all the bearings of this matter, and have as deliberately determined to stand by the flag we have reared so long as we shall have life and strength to do so. We have thrown to the world—"Children: their Rights, Privileges and True Relations to Society," and we shall maintain it argumentatively, if possible; defiantly, if need be, against all opposition, let it come from whence it may, or let its character be what it may. Argument we know we shall not have to encounter. Scientific hindrances we know we shall not find in our path. Common Sense we know will offer no word of reproof. We shall, however, encounter hoary-headed bigotry, blind intolerance and fossilized authority—and we are prepared.

Symposia!

BY C. L. JAMES.

I thought Lucifer had cried "Hold, enough!" to all correspondents whose souls were burdened with the vaccination and vivisection questions; else I should have sent in an answer to E. C. Walker quite a while ago. As it was, I wrote to him personally—and elicited a brilliant flash of silence. But it seems I was mistaken; for now comes Flora W. Fox, with a string of quotations on vaccination; amidst which there is little of her own that I might criticise freely without danger of hurting one for whose original ideas I entertain the highest esteem. But I need not criticise—only compare and quote, in order to show her that these medical lights who have imposed upon her represent the "Movement in Favor of Ignorance."

Dr. J. E. Coderre informs us that smallpox is a "disease which does not exist!" Dr. E. C. Amerige says glanders or farcey (farcy?) is identical with tuberculosis in man! Or rather, if his English were straighter, I should take him to mean that Jenner said so! If he means that, I deny it: if the other, he should read Abbott's "Hygiene of Transmissible Diseases." He also says that Jenner's two first "victims" died of consumption. They certainly have had time to die—of something! The "Siglo Medico" says that of 304 vaccinations, 224 were syphilized. And Prof. E. M. Crookshank says we have no test for the difference between a pure lymph and one which might communicate venereal disease. I refer these authorities to the Encyclopedia Britannica article on vaccination, which Blue says is written by an anti-vaccinator. It will inform them that the whole idea of venereal disease being ever communicated by vaccination is a bugaboo, unsupported by an iota of real evidence. If the quotation marks are not wrong, Flora herself says "Make (doctors) responsible for professional acts and none would vaccinate." Whoever said it, I will inform her that doctors are civilly and criminally responsible for professional acts. Also, that I, as an Anarchist, have a very poor opinion of that remedy for their blunders.

A brief symposium on May Huntley's conundrum, "Why should love die?" is unquestionably very much to the purpose of Lucifer. The point is also one on which I should consider Flora W. Fox's opinion worthy the gravest consideration. My own—as brief as can be desired—is that, according to my experience, frankly varietist love does not die. Love which pretends to be permanently or temporarily exclusive does—because it aims at the stars. It is the passion of a spoiled child, crying for the moon. It dies because it is against the solid basis of human nature, and in harmony only with the wind and froth. Like Macbeth's ambition, it "o'erleaps itself and falls on the other"—into indifference; or repulsion.

* * *

And now, a word to the editor. In shutting me off from opportunity to answer Walker, which you correctly judged was a "scratch" I should have come up to, smiling,—you remarked it was a fact of tremendous significance that a monopoly is sought by the same school which recommends vaccination and vivisection (though all medical schools do the last). You have read the papers to little purpose lately if you do not know the Dowieites would like a monopoly just as well as the regular physicians. That is not a sin of regular medicine, as such. It is a sin of human nature, as such. The significant fact is not that regulars seek a monopoly; but that to a considerable extent they get it! And why they, rather than the Dowieites? Obviously, because people think they deserve it better. And why do people think so, except because the regulars, as compared with their rivals, do deserve it? If any one attempts to turn the tables on me by asking why the regular physicians deserve a monopoly better than their rivals, my answer is ready. It is because they practice the inductive method; selling no cure-all, like Morrison's Pills; having no dogma, like the homœopathist's similia similibus curantur; passing off no second-hand suit of clothes for the last novelty, like the hygienists; indulging in no absurdities about "faith," "magnetism," "mediumship," "Indian doctoring," etc., like tag, rag, and bobtail; but going wholly by observation, experiment, and record. A monopoly certainly tends to break them of this admirable habit. That's one reason, among others, why I never thought they should have the monopoly.

I have read Paul L. Sautter's vaccination and vivisection article; and bear cheerful witness that he knows more about his subject than any one else I have heard from on that side. Still, like all the rest of them, he is teaching his grandmother how to knit. All the truth of his article he might have learned from one good book on hygiene by a "drug doctor"—such a book as Abbott's Transmissible Diseases—which would also have corrected his quite numerous errors. He says that vivisection "as practiced now" furnishes no knowledge for the treatment of suffering humanity. I hope he will deign to inform us whether he would have a felon on his little finger treated by a quack or a surgeon? If the former—I shall rejoice to learn that he be has espoused Mrs. Montelle. If the latter, he does not mean what he says; for surgery, which he correctly describes as the only exact part of medical science, can no more flourish without vivisection than a tree without roots. If he had read Abbott on transmissible diseases, he would not say that doctors suppose microbes to produce the same effects on all kinds of animals. They find some animals quite immune to diseases readily communicated by inoculation to others. He is mistaken in saying we breathe typhoid microbes in the air—correct in saying that many people, despising the instruction of "drug doctors," eat and drink these microbes with their food. All who keep up this practice long are reasonably certain to have typhoid fever. Those who don't do so, never have it.

He has got things mixed when he talks about microbes being scavengers which "purify the blood." Some microbes are harmless, as he says; but it is simply an exploded idea that those of typhoid, cholera, and other transmissible diseases, do us any good, except that, with some diseases, of which the best known example is smallpox, one attack usually secures immunity for the future. A far safer and pleasanter method of attaining that result, is the anti-toxin treatment—oldest and best known example, vaccination. "Hydrotherapy, fasting, exercise, massage, osteopathy, and suggestive therapeutics" are, it seems, the medicine of the future. He should have added Indian doctors, natural bone-setters, and seventh sons of seventh sons.

Vivisection "causes pain." Not necessarily. Anæsthetics, themselves a fruit of vivisection, furnish means of experimenting on animals without causing pain. And this is always done, not only as a matter of humanity but convenience, except where sensibility of some kind is the function experimented upon. Because, as E. C. Walker observed, in his recent tirade on this subject, pain disorders the functions, and thus is an obstacle to their study.

Mr. Sautter says he can "substantiate by facts" his assertion that osteopaths, "natural healers" usually cure the cases which have been given up by medicine. Well, when he trots out his facts, and they prove what he says, for any but hypochondriacal cases, which medicine "gave up" on the ground that there was nothing to treat, I assure him he will not find the "drug doctors" too proud to learn of the "natural healers." They are, indeed, above practicing imposition. They bluntly tell such a patient as a hoodooed African, that there's nothing the matter with him; and if he persists in fancying himself sick, he may pay a "natural healer" to fancy him well. But when Mr. Sautter "asserts" (without offering proof) that "medicine is dogmatic, pedantic, and self-assertive." I, (without offering proof) deny it. I assert that hydrotherapy, osteopathy, etc., etc., is all this; and that medicine is inductive.

Indecent Prudery

How long will minds reeking with moral depravity be allowed to stamp the insignia of their mental condition upon the growing boys and girls? How long, will youths and maidens of this country be tainted in mind, debilitated in body, as the results of purient curiosity aroused by the efforts of our so-called public educators to hide or ignore the facts of sex and the existence of sex laws?

Here is a sample of their work. Read the following, and think of the mental condition of the one who proposed this order:

"The Somerville (Mass.) School Board at a very short meeting adopted an unusual order, which was offered by Mr. Sanborn, of Ward 5. The order reads:

"That in the primary and grammar schools instruction in physiology and hygiene be entirely oral, and that hereafter a single desk book be furnished for the use of teachers only; and it is hereby ordered that instruction be regarding the proper care of the body rather than the structural formation.

"Speaking on the order, Mr. Sanborn said that the books now in use are objected to by some of the parents of scholars. In addition, he stated that he considered certain portions of the books improper—in fact, indecent."

Mr. Sanborn considers certain portions of the physiology in question indecent. Why does he consider them indecent? Where is the indecency? In the physiology or in Mr. Sanborn's mind? I will leave my reader to answer the question.

But as you ponder on this, call to mind the millions upon millions of white-faced wrecks, some of whom stare you in the face in every community. You will see no brightness in their eyes, no life in their movements. Poor, hopeless wrecks. They go through life suffering all the tortures of the damned. There is no need for a hell in the next world. They get it here.

There is no effect without a cause. Health and vigor of a high degree is the natural heritage of man and of woman, too. Why, then, these white-faced wrecks? Why their abnormal condition, which makes a drunkard of one, an opium fiend of another, a pervert of another?

I can state with the absolute certainty that comes with unfaltering conviction, deduced from long and diligent study, that the primary school of all this depravity—the first turn in the road of life that leads to this moral and physical degradation—is the blighting, even murderous secrecy maintained on sexual subjects by those who have the young in their care.

I want those inhuman beings who are attempting to perpetuate this crime, who are endeavoring to breed moral disease into the minds of our growing boys and girls, to be thoroughly understood. I want the fact cried aloud that they, by their demoralizing efforts, are condemning to a life of uselessness, misery and disease not thousands, but millions of human beings. Medical science may hasten the funeral of these poor victims, but there is no disaster of storm or tide, no earthly condition, past or present, which has produced one-tenth of the misery, physical and moral degradation, caused by this Gorgon horror—Prudishness.

Look back upon your own life—you who read these lines. Have you ever erred? Have you not committed gross sins against your body that could easily have been avoided by knowledge? Have you ever thought of the damnable crime committed by those who educated you in failing to inculcate the plain facts in reference to your body? If you can answer no to these plain questions, I can only say you are a rare exception. Nearly every man and many women, too, bestow upon the altar of this dearly-bought experience a certain amount of their innate vigor and vitality.

But these vile prudes would go on murdering, go on blighting the best and fairest, simply because their own minds need cleansing and disinfecting.

I want their crimes stopped.

Who will help?

Who will reach out and save the souls and bodies of those who may soon be struggling in the darkness of misery and disease created by these prudes?

Who will aid in making the plain, wholesome truths of physiology so universally known that vulgarity of mind in reference to this subject will disappear like filth before the searching rays of warm sunshine?

Wake up, my friends, to your duty. Have you a son, a daughter? If not there must be sons or daughters somewhere in whom you are interested. Save them from the moral and physical blighting influence of prudes as you would from wild beasts.—"Physical Culture," New York.

A Gentle Reminder. Will our friends and subscribers kindly remember that it takes money, and a good deal of money, to publish a radical weekly paper in a large city? Please remember also that Lucifer has no "Sustaining Fund," no "Sustaining Club," as have nearly all other radical papers. That it depends wholly upon equitable co-operation,—dues on subscription and sale of its pamphlets and other literature, and not on donations, for the means of meeting its weekly and monthly bills. We are now entering the twenty-second year of publication under the same editorial management, consequently Lucifer is no mushroom growth, no infant of yesterday, but notwithstanding its years it cannot live without the constant helpful effort of those who believe in its work,—who believe in the necessity of persistent, never-ending agitation of the question of BETTER IDEALS, as well as better conditions, for the building of a better race of human beings, in order that the evils of our present social and economic life may be removed. Debt is a hard task-master; will our friends do what they can to save Lucifer from such bondage?

"Blessed is he who has found his work. Let him ask no more blessedness: he has a life purpose. Labor is life."

Anger turns the mind out of doors and bolts the entrance.—Plutarch.

Children's Rights.

On first page of this issue will be found a selection from the writings of Tennie C. Claflin, written and published about thirty years ago. Many of the older readers of Lucifer remember well the wide-spread excitement, not to say consternation, caused throughout the United States by the writings and lectures of two phenomenally bright and courageous women who edited and published, for a time, "Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly," and many books and pamphlets besides, and who for several years made occasional tours through the country speaking to multitudes of eager listeners, including many of the most intelligent and cultured people America could boast.

Both these heroic women are still living; both married wealthy husbands in England, and are now widowed; and though we seldom hear from them now we cannot forget the work they did for human freedom, human justice and progress, a generation ago. No matter how much they may have retracted, no matter how much they may have failed to fulfill the promise of their younger years—as apostles of a newer and better gospel, a newer and better cult, than that taught and lived by the evangelists and prophets of olden times, we cannot altogether forget the tremendous shaking up of the dry bones in the camps of the Grundies by these two intrepid iconoclasts, nor the aid then given by them to the radical movements of today.

The chapter on "Children, Their Rights and Privileges" in the volume entitled "Constitutional Equality of Woman," should be printed in pamphlet form and given a wide circulation. M. H.

Encouragement for the Press-Writers.

The following letter from Dr. J. B. Wilson of Cincinnati, President of the National Secular Union and Free thought Federation, was forwarded to us for publication by Francis B. Livesey, of Sykesville, Md., who is probably doing more than any other man to promote efficiency, through concert of action, among the members of the great volunteer army of Press-Writers of America. In this letter Dr. Wilson says:

Another Ring Letter to hand. The more I look into the work of the Press Writers' Association, the more I am impressed with both its importance and the great possibilities that may evelop out of it. I think I can see in it the foundation of a great institution. It is on the right track. With the proper business management, it is bound to become a power. As I understand it, the intent is to bring all the brainy writers and active workers in the Liberal cause in touch with each other, and unite them in the common purpose of maintaining the freedom of the press. Every member is in himself a reporter, whose duty it is to inform the officials of the society of every attempt to suppress free speech in the locality in which he may reside. I can readily perceive, that with an earnest, fearless representative in every city, and especially county-seat, throughout the country, this organization will develop an influence that will be felt. It will be the duty of each representative to report such prosecutions as those of Moore's and Govan's and other vital issues in his local papers, thus bringing the truth of such assaults upon our liberties to the eyes of the general public, and so enlist friends and sympathizers, and thus break down the prejudice that exists against us.

Let the good work proceed, and the membership increase, until in all parts of this country myriad voices will be raised in protest at every invasion of the rights of free press and free speech as guaranteed by the Constitution, to every citizen of this great republic. This is the object as I understand it of the Press-Writers' Association. It should commend itself to every Liberal correspondent and writer.

I am pleased to observe that my suggestion that the Association secure an official paper is being considered by the officers. The ring-letters grow burdensome as they pass along, and besides reach only a few of the members. In order that the Association may grow, every member should have a medium of communication, and the work of the Association be brought to public observation. I would like to see all of our Liberal papers open their columns to the work. When the society grows in strength and membership it should have an organ of its own. Its peculiar and special line of labor and defense, will in no way conflict with or financially affect our other Liberal journals. The more freedom maintained in the commercial press, the more freethinkers there will be to take and read freethought papers.

The opportunities of Dr. Wilson for obtaining correct information, and for forming a correct opinion, in regard to the importance of a Press-Writers' Club, or association, are most ample, and his opinion will doubtless have much weight with our readers and with Freethinkers and Rationalists generally.

The following rules for the guidance of beginners were sent us by D. Webster Groh, of Hagerstown, Maryland, whose work as a Press-Writer is scarcely less efficient and persistent than that of Mr. Livesey:

The main points of success in writing letters to the daily newspapers are: First—to have some particular reason for writing them, i. e., something on which to comment that has appeared recently in that paper.

Second—that this comment come promptly after the article commented on appeared, so that it is "timely," as editors call it.

Third—that the comment be brief, pointed, courteous, plainly written in black, legible ink, on one side of the paper only, in grammatical language and punctuation, with properly spelled and well selected words.

Fourth—that it address the editor in the style he usually inserts letters, whether "Mr. Editor," "To the Editor," "Editor of The——," or any other form he adopts peculiar to his own paper.

This last point makes the writer seem acquainted with his paper and avoids the need of changing the form of address in the manuscript.

All noble acts lie outside the creeds; and the assumption that the impulse to these acts is a monopoly of Christianity has no warrant either in past or present history.—Edward Clodd.

Vaccination and Vivisection.

Replying, briefly as possible to C. L. James' "Symposial," I will say:

1. Lucifer did not cry "hold, enough, to all correspondents whose souls were burdened with the vaccination and vivisection questions," but, with all its liberality or freedom of platform, Lucifer is compelled to remember that it costs a deal of money to print a radical journal, and that it would be unjust to those who furnish the needful to keep the light burning if we should devote the entire space, or the greater part of the space, of the paper to the discussion of a single subject by two disputants, however skillful these two may be, in the use of their forensic weapons.

2. It was and is quite right and proper, after a brief interval, to allow others a chance to express their thought on what seems to them a subject of very great importance, hence Flora Fox, Paul Sautter and others have been granted brief hearing, but if each had demanded as much space as required by Messrs. James and Walker there would be little room for any other question to be investigated. Even while I write these lines I am in receipt of a letter from an old friend and helper whose article on vaccination and vivisection I had ventured to cut down to suit our limited space, scoring me severely for taking such liberty with her article, and demanding its return to her. In reply to this castigation, and to others of like tone and temper, I will say that if these good friends will furnish the means to print a paper the size of the "Chicago American" I will print their articles as written, with little or no regard to rules of literary criticism.

3. If Friend James were the chairman or "mode rator" of a convention of people assembled to discuss matters of common interest he would probably rule as "out of order" those who should use language such as he himself makes frequent use of in Lucifer, when speaking of his opponents—"quacks," "tag-rag and bobtail," etc. Admitting for argument that the erudition of Bro. James is so enormously superior to that of the average woman or man that he is justified in treating their opinions with ridicule and contempt, I very much doubt the propriety of such treatment, and while Lucifer's platform can bear the strain of such manners for a time, some of us decidedly prefer to listen to discussions in which more courteous methods are adopted.

Hitherto I have refrained from giving publicity to my own opinions, except in a general way regarding the much disputed vaccination and vivisection questions, preferring that others should do the talking, but now that I am accused, by inference at least, of lack of courage in defining my position I will give, in few words, something a little more definite:

I class "regular medicine," orthodox medicine, in the same category with regular theology, orthodox theology. I regard them as chips from the same old block. Doctors of theology believe in vicarious atonement, so do the doctors of medicine. The priest says, in substance, "Go it boys! have a good time. Take your fill of sin, and when you are tired of sinning, come to me and I will fix you up all right for the next world. I have the genuine cure, the only original cure, for the sin-sick soul—all others counterfeit. Come and be saved; charges reasonable!"

So likewise the medical doctor, by implication, says, "Go it, boys! have a good time. Indulge your passions and appetites to hearts' content, and when the natural consequences overtake you—when your joints are racked with rheumatism or gout, or when tuberculosis, dyspepsia or syphilis make life a burden, come to ME! Hanging up in my office is a diploma from a regular medical college certifying that I know all about disease, its cause and cure. For a reasonable consideration I'll fix you up, good as new. The learning of the ages and the whole pharmacopœia of the world are at my command. Come and be cured. But beware of 'quacks!' 'natural healers,' 'osteopaths,' 'hydropaths,' and all irregulars. All these constitute the 'Movement in Favor of Ignorance.' The people should be protected rom the ignorance and cupidity of these harpies, and therefore, out of pure benevolence and human sympathy we have secured laws by which these ignorant irregulars can be properly punished when they invade the domain of the healing art."

From the standpoint of an ignorant "layman," vivisection is closely allied to the theologic nostrum known as the "blood of Jesus." Jesus, the innocent victim, was vivisected on the "cross," for the space of three hours, in order that mankind might escape the pains of hell. Millions of innocent quadrupeds, insects, birds and reptiles, have been, and are now, vivisected, slain by inches, by knife, by fire and deadly drug, in order that mankind may escape the punishment nature visits upon those who disregard hygienic rules of living; or in order to outwit "the devil" in the shape of the invisible and omnipresent "microbe."

In like manner vaccination is clearly allied to the theologic sacraments, Baptism, The Lord's Supper and Marriage, by which sacraments adults, and also children, are supposed to be rendered "immune" to or from the snares of the "world the flesh and the devil"—the chief difference being that the vaccine virus injected into the veins of a well person is not expected to make that person immune in the presence of any danger, or devil, except one—small-pox.

Our paper is too small for full elaboration of this subject; those who care to read all sides will find a valuable compend or collection of authorities on these matters in the pamphlet "Vivisection and the Drug Delusion" compiled by J. Winfield Scott, with Prefatory Letter by Philip G. Peabody of Boston; price ten cents. Copies can presumably be had by addressing Frank D. Blue, of Terre Haute, Indiana, editor of "Vaccination."

Report of Meetings.

The meeting of Lucifer's Chicago Club, Thursday eve, May 23, to consider ways and means for an active summer campaign of agitation and education, was fairly well attended. The chief subject of discussion was The Press-Writers' Association, concerning which quite a number of articles have appeared in late issues of this paper. Among those who spoke in favor of the proposition were Jonathan Mayo Crane, Dr. C. S. Wood, Dr. Chas. J. Lewis, Geo. B. Wheeler and the writer of these lines. Of those who took a stand more or less in the negative were Emma Goldman, A. Isaac, editor of "Free Society, and C. Fuetzner. On the part of the affirmative it was urged that there never was a more favorable opportunity for effective work in favor of freedom—freedom of thought, of speech, of press and of mails, including, of necessity, freedom of non-invasive action.

Mention was made of the prosecution of the Dowieites because they prefer to die rather than employ a medical or drug doctor, as giving an excellent opening for the Press-Writers to get in arguments in favor of the right of every person to be his own doctor as well as his own priest or lawyer. If the state, or the community can force its doctor upon the heretic in the healing art, how long will it be till it will force its priest, or theologic creed upon the heretic in religion?

In favor of concert of action among Press-Writers reference was made to the effectiveness of an organized army as compared to that of an unorganized mob. To this it was replied that the unorganized, untrained and undrilled Boers of South Africa had made a very good record as against more than ten times their number of well-organized and well-drilled English soldiers. To this it was rejoined that the Boers were not without training or drill. As some of us see it they have had the best training in the world for effective soldiers. Each man was, from youth up, accustomed to the use of arms and inured to danger. Then when the need of concerted action came it was a very easy thing to fall in line and keep step with comrades in arms, also to intelligently carry out the part of the work planned and assigned by the foreman, the captain, the colonel or the general—still reserving the right to refuse obedience when his own judgment told him the order was wrong.

Such independence as this would destroy the organized despotism known as the British army, or the American army, but makes the organized Boer army all the more effective, and would make the organized army of Press-Writers a power well nigh irresistible if properly directed.

Without taking definite action on the matter the meeting adjourned to Thursday eve, June 6, when the same and other plans of campaign work will be further considered. Place of meeting, as before, 500 Fulton St.

EMMA GOLDMAN AT THE SOCIETY OF ANTHROPOLOGY.

Oriental Hall, Masonic Temple, was well filled with expectant hearers who came to meet and greet the exceptionally bright, earnest and eloquent expounder of the gospel of Anarchism on Sunday afternoon last. Lack of time and space prevents further report at this place than to say that the speaker evidently carried her listeners with her, in her exposition of "Modern Phases of Anarchism," and that the few dissentients, whose voices were heard when criticisms were in order, were most triumphantly answered by the speaker herself and by Dr. Juliet H. Severance, A. Isaac, Dr. Chas. Lewis and others.

At the close of the prolonged session the Society of Anthropology, decided to hold no more open meetings till September, but to meet every Sunday eve at the house of some member, or at such place as may be determined upon from week to week. For further information the inquirer is referred to the Secretary, Dr. Chas. J. Lewis, 733 Carroll Ave.

"Why Should Love Die?"

BY HELEN WEBSTER.

Under proper conditions human affection between congenial natures should be as enduring as life itself. This is true of our attraction and delight in objects of inanimate nature. Our admiration of a beautiful landscape, of the majesty and sublimity of mountain range, or of sky and sea, remains with us as long as sense and sight exist.

The lily, the rose, or the forgetmenot wins our love at first sight and holds it while life and reason remain. In these matters we follow our own natural ideas and instincts, but in our human attractions and relations we accept models formed and fashioned for us by the designing few, for the exploitation of the many.

That the fellows who invented and inaugurated the present system of marriage, with its degrading and revolting "support" fetish, were wise beyond their time is proven by the servility of the race as manifest in its tenacious adherence to said fetish through all the centuries thence.

Bond or free, the world round, both men and women bow before the shrine of this hideous god. Woman believes, as she believes in nothing else, that it is not only her right and privilege, but her duty to sell sex favors for a support. Has she an income, or her support assurred from other source, she expects pay for said favors, all the same.

Free couples form few exceptions to the prevailing custom; while they eliminate the formula of marriage, they retain all the virus of the compound. Often they feel, or seem to feel, a sort of pity for the unenlightened bond couples, but they are pronounced and persistent in practice of many of the vices of the marriage institution—the close, intimate and constant association, home or abroad, occupying the same room, and even the same bed.

The supporter's home is cared for, meals cooked, clothes washed and mended—all without charge by said free woman, the same as done by the bond woman; and like her also, she expects "support" for sex favors. And the sum invested in said support, not being fixed or stipulated, is left to be determined by the means or generosity of the supporter, thus engendering in the mind of the free woman a wifely concern as to the contents of said supporter's purse, while she regards with no friendly eye the woman having a near or remote prospect of sharing with herself the "support" from said purse.

And again, like the bond woman or wife, she feels that "eternal vigilance" is the price of a good support. Wearying of such surveillance, is it surprising that the man should leave this home and seek to establish another, in the vain hope for happiness upon such a basis?

When will it dawn upon this man's mind that the love he boasts as "free" is the costliest merchandise a man can buy?

A woman that sells her labor for a stipulated sum, whether by the week, by the month or by the year, when paid this price, knows she has no claims upon her employer's purse. Such an arrangement between free couples would doubtless in their minds, degrade the woman to the level of a "hired girl," whereas the highest ideal of "free" couples seems to be to elevate the woman to the exalted position of the bond or married woman.

Love, nature's best and brightest gift to man, is too pure, too delicate, too ethereal, to thrive in the foul and fetid atmosphere of avarice, of cupidity, of commercialism; hence, when subjected to these conditions, meets an early death—perishes from out the hearts of men and women.

CHANGES AND CREDITS on mailing list are now made but once each month. When, therefore, our friends do not see the number on their tabs changed promptly they will understand the cause. Our mailing list is now set by a linotype machine, hence changes and eliminations cannot be so promptly nor so cheaply attended to. No loss of numbers, however, will be sustained by subscribers, as duplicate copies will be sent to them at their new place, when notified of change.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Bolton Hall, New York:—I enclose my dollar renewing my subscription. Lucifer and the Wilmington "Justice" are the most courageous papers that I know.

Leroy Cummings, San Diego, Calif.:—Find enclosed $1.25. Please send me Lucifer for another year. I value your paper very much, and as an anarchist, I most heartily endorse your efforts to overthrow the tyranny of the ancient marriage institution. Realization of personal responsibility must replace the reverence for the politician's license and the clergyman's ceremony before present deplorable conditions can possibly improve.

Walter Breen, 309-13th. St., Omaha, Neb.:—Just a line to endorse the recent agitation started in Lucifer re a Press-Writers' column. I will say that if you know any fellow Liberal who is seeking to gain admission to the secular press and desires his articles typewritten, that I would be glad to do this free of charge, and in this small way I would feel I was contributing my mite to a good cause. I can find time to typewrite say one article each week if not too long. I shall take the greatest care of the MSS and will return same with copy.

Mary F. Smith, 1939 Broadway, Cleveland, Ohio:—I was so well pleased with E. C. Walker's reply to C. L. James' defense of vivisection that I took a day off from the workshop to congratulate him on his wise, humane, fearless and just criticism: I am no hero-worshiper, but like to render unto Cæsar that which is due to Cæsar. I have always admired Mr. Walker's articles—all that I have had the pleasure of reading. It is beyond my comprehension how any one claiming to be a freethinker can uphold or defend vivisection, and would say to Mr. James that I have seen more fatal results from the treatment of regular diplomaed physicians than I have ever seen from that of the so-called quacks. It is largely a question of fees. I would by no means say that all physicians are unsympathetic and selfish, but, like the members of royal families, doctors are becoming so numerous that they have to resort to all kinds of schemes to secure incomes whereby to live—but all to the detriment of the people.

O. N. Bancroft, Bartow, Fla.:—Referring to the subject on which you ask for a symposium, there seems to be a material basis for continued love.

I have observed persons coming together, as man and wife, on the plane recognized as the animal or physical in great preponderance. These persons soon get restless or uneasy under the bonds; wordy wars ensue, and frequently more serious conflicts result.

Another class of those who marry, are such as are adapted to each other not on the physical alone but also on the intellectual. With these the duration of mutual love is more lasting.

Another class, fewer in number by far than either of the classes just mentioned, are those who supply each other's needs on the physical, the intellectual and also on the spiritual planes. Spirit, being the ultimate of all progress in the processes of nature, is beyond comparison the most important consideration. It seems to me at least reasonable that when we meet persons thus mated on all three planes of life that such unions would be permanent love unions through a long earthly pilgrimage. This is the opinion of one who has had unusually good opportunities for observation.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness who addresses humanity.—From the Preface.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jeanneste Gliders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, acteuthe, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents.

What The Young Need to Know; a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages, 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Cloth. $1.

Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

HELEN WILMANS,

Who has tested her ideas and is now reaping a rich reward from them financially, has written out the secret of her success and printed it in a book called "THE CONQUEST OF POVERTY." Forty thousand copies of which sold before it was fairly off the press. Paper 50 cents. Address Freedom Publishing Co., Sea Breeze, Florida.

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL GUESSES

By E. C. WALKER.

No man is wise enough to foresee the secondary results of any proposed restriction, and no history is copious enough to record the evils that have ensued upon denials of liberty.—George E. Macdonald.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo. 172 pages. Price 25 cents.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. V., NO. 21. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, JUNE 8, E. M. 301. [C. E. 1901.] WHOLE NO. 868

MORE LIGHT!

The prayer of Ajax was for light;
Through all that dark and desperate fight,
The blackness of that noon-day night,
He asked but for the return of sight,
To see his foeman's face.

Let our unceasing, earnest prayer
Be, too, for light, for strength to bear
Our portion of the weight of care,
That crushes into dumb despair
One-half the human race. —Longfellow.

Love.

BY J. H. GREER, M. D.

Since the world began no subject has engrossed writers and singers more than the subject of love. But it is only in times more modern that the truest conceptions of its power and meanings are being translated to an eager, listening multitude.

Love is a divine law. It is a necessity of every human. To live in an atmosphere from which love is excluded is as destructive to the best impulses of spiritual being as to live where sunlight is not would be to physical or material being. As cold is absence of heat, as darkness is absence of light, so hate or ill feeling is absence of love. Love begets life, hate destroys it. This force though invisible except through its workings is the most powerful force in the realm of mind.

In science it has come to be recognized that worry, anger, hatred and kindred wrong feeling have effects positively injurious to one's self and one's associates as well. Any person who is sensitive can notice the effects contact with different individuals has upon him. Some leave him feeling dull and depressed; others leave him buoyant and glad for the meeting. This is due to characteristics cultivated, or otherwise. With some natures it is easy to exercise the better faculties of mind; with others they seem to feel best when making trouble. These natural conditions are due to heredity and pre-natal influence, and to the environment in which one has been reared as a child. When only such children are born as are conceived through conjugal love will it be a natural thing for good traits to shine forth. However, heredity is said to count for only twenty-five per cent. And though a child may not have been generated by love, he may be trained in the right way of thinking and doing, because it is to his own advantage. Love is the law; to go contrary to a decree of nature is to insure suffering for one's self and intimates. To illustrate: There is the well-known law of gravitation. If one steps over a cliff or precipice he will be bruised or killed, and to avoid disasters he takes advantage of that law for his own preservation. So with the law of love. In doing good to his fellows one is merely obeying the law of self-preservation. And while doing so he has the happy consciousness that his acts bear only good fruit.

There are many shades of love. We cannot even say that those who experience it in its best known expression have learned all there is to be learned. It may be likened to an inexhaustible fountain; the more that is given the more remains for further beneficent uses.

Love is made manifest between the sexes, between parents and children, between friend and friend; it is to be seen in exchange of service—in the barter of spiritual and material goods, as it were. No one should be confined to any one particular phase of love. As Lowell wrote:

"I would not have this perfect love of ours
Grow from a single root, a single stem,
Bearing no goodly fruit, but only flowers
That idly hide Life's iron diadem;
It should grow always like that Eastern tree
Whose limbs take root and spread forth constantly;
That love for one from which there doth not spring
Wide love for all, is but a worthless thing."

It has not reached a healthy stage of growth when content with just its own. The loss of the object of affection would have a blighting effect, and the power of the individual for receiving or conferring happiness lost.

The many gradations of love, or perhaps it were better to say the many stages of development, makes the conception in one phase entirely unintelligible to another. Almost any two individuals will give it a different shade of meaning, or especially that love which exists between the sexes. The love of the low, undeveloped human is but little beyond that of the brute creation. Between the sexes it can only be expressed in the gratification of the sexual instinct common throughout nature. Love among the civilized and cultivated has thousands of ways of making itself known. Its influence is spread through the entire being, and in turn is qualified by its connection with every other feeling.

An element known as personal magnetism is very much to be observed in social relations. Like many other forces it possesses an attractive and repulsive character or manifestation. This attraction is to be noticed among school girls when they walk with arms about each other, or when a child nestles against its mother's breast; when friends clasp each other by the hand. Attractive qualities in either sex renders the magnetic attraction agreeable, though the infinity of variations in persons makes that which is attractive to one indifferent or unpleasant to another.

The requirements of true love, "the highest form of altruism," is that the exchange of spiritual qualifications, of personal magnetism or of physical attractiveness be equal or nearly so. A love in which more is given than is received does not rest upon a lasting base.

In his books of "Fables and Essays," John Bryan gives the following which is quite to the point:

"A young man married a beautiful young girl whom he loved very much. At their first meal he carved the steak, and out of his affection for her he gave her the tender part. This he continued to do without interruption, giving her the tender part of the steak for three years.

"On the morning of the third anniversary of their wedding he begged her to carve the steak—pleading as he pretended—that he had strained his wrist.

"To this she readily consented, and as usual kept the tender part for herself.

"The next morning, his wrist having suddenly recovered, he carved the steak and kept the tender part for himself.

"At this his wife burst into tears, exclaiming, 'You no longer love me.'

"'Ah, madam,' he said, 'I have done an act of selfishness only once, which you have repeated a thousand times.'"

A true love presumes, although it does not demand, an equitable exchange. Unselfishness beyond a certain point causes unhappiness and is good neither for giver nor receiver.

In Love's Garden.

BY J. WM. LLOYD.

The question was lately asked, "Love Dies—Why does Love Die?" It is a pertinent question and goes to the root of the matter. I will not pretend to give an exhaustive answer, but I think I know several reasons why it dies and I want to speak of them.

Lovers may be roughly classified as exclusive lovers and varietists. Each class looks at love from a different standpoint, and each class has its own way of letting love die.

Now home (I will use this word in a broad sense as of a place where love is) may be compared to a garden and love to a plant and the lover to a gardener. An exclusive lover is generally a very noble and sincere and earnest individual, but a trifle over-concentrated. As a gardener he thinks he is morally limited to one crop, and having made his choice he throws all the energies of his strong nature into its cultivation—he gives all the forces of his life to the loving of this one woman. This is all well within its limitations. If he has made a wise choice and cultivates wisely he gets a rich crop but—and here's the rub—if he has chosen the lily for his one crop he gets no roses, and if he has chosen the rose he has no lilies. Nature is inexorable and no one woman can be everything. Women are limited, and a strong, rich development in one direction means, usually, a corresponding lack in another. But perchance this gardener of roses sees a lily and loves it. Perhaps he could help loving it, perhaps he couldn't—never mind that now—he loves it anyway, and finds himself in a fix. His creed is that he can love but one—I mean that he can raise but one crop—and so it is altogether out of order for him to love two at once and he must make a choice. Perhaps as the lily-love is a new one he chooses that, gets a divorce from the rose-love and lets the rose-love die. Or perhaps, after loving the lily in a guilty fashion awhile, he turns resolutely back to his rose and lets the lily-love die. One way or the other some love-dying is pretty sure to be done before the business is over. And sometimes he makes such a mess of it, and becomes such a slack gardener, that both loves die, because neither has all his attention, and he goes altogether afield to browse among the thistles with the rest of the asses.

The great trouble with this foolish gardener is that like most of his class he has a faith that the woman—the plant—he has chosen is perfect and will yield him every kind of flower and every kind of fruit. And when he finds his mistake, that nature has limited her, he simply transforms the same foolish faith to another woman who is equally limited in another way.

The truth is that all loving is limited, and all lovers are limited, and all flowering and fruiting is limited. Love the unlimited all you please, worship it and reach for it, but use common sense, and kindly and considerately fit yourself to the actual. Remember that choosing is refusing, devotion is exclusion, and that everything costs its price.

Some say the exclusive gardeners kill out their plants by over-cultivation, but I have never seen it. I guess there is little danger there. Sham work, not cultivation kills, I reckon.

Varietist gardeners are different. Most of them don't believe in cultivation. They are great on nature. But they generally cultivate some in a half-conscious, crude, one-sided, spasmodic way. They attend to a great many plants, of many different kinds, cultivate all occasionally, in a half-hearted way, but chiefly concern themselves with gathering flowers and fruits, inhaling fragrance, enjoying shade, etc. This sort of thing doesn't work very well. A really wild plant never becomes attached to a gardener, because a gardener who never cultivate is really no gardener at all only a rancher. As soon as the gardener begins to cultivate the plant the plant begins to love the gardener, but it also begins to depends upon his cultivation. It has lost its old wild self-sufficiency. If then its gardener cultivates it some, only now and then, lavishly or lazily, any old way, as the mood possesses, this plant is not going to thrive. It is dead sure to sicken, likely to die. It may come to hate the gardener for his neglect and selfishness. Your warmest woman is a proud creature and it hurts her pride to be petted or forgotten just as it happens. She wants a man to appreciate her, and one who is reliable, not a hot-by-cold vacillator. But she may love a man very much, even if he loves her only a little, if she knows from the start and always knows what she can depend upon. Plants and lovers and business all thrive on trust.

Varietists certainly gather rich bouquets of wild flowers, rich feasts of spontaneous fruits, but they seldom get anything like the full good of these. They are too hasty, fickle, wandering. It takes loving study, attention, continued watchfulness and interest to get the full beauty of even the humblest blossom, to appreciate the flavor of the simplest berry. And the resplendent-double flowers, the richest fragrances, the largest fruits never come to these—they are for the gardener who devotes and studies and concentrates and cultivates and puts his own life into his love for a few.

So then I, as a gardener, would stand somewhat between these two groups, reconciling each, correcting each. I think the exclusivist misses it by trying to get everything from one thing and I think the varietist misses it still worse by trying to get everything from everything.

My advice to those who go into love-gardening is: Love one and love her very much, and appreciate her and cultivate her so that you bring her to the highest flowering and fruiting her nature is normally capable of (so shall you bless her and yourself) but be very careful how you strive after the very double-flowers, the heavy fragrances, the mammoth and seedless fruits. These things are mostly monstrosities and excess and cost too much otherwhere. They result from meddling and deforming, not from cultivation which is selection, appreciation, and the supplying of all natural conditions and normal necessaries of growth. But do not expect too much of this one. She is your Central One, but she has her limitations, perhaps equal to her abilities. If you feel the need, get a few other plants in your garden to round out, balance, harmonize and fulfil your work and life, but don't attempt too many. You, too, are limited, very limited, in time, health, strength, knowledge, love-power, power to enjoy, about everything, and if you cannot give a plant all the loving cultivation it needs for normal growth you better let it alone. Still there is such a thing as including a neglected plant out of mere pity and sympathy. Sometimes that is a good thing, sometimes it isn't. Use your judgment and watch results. But anyway, don't give it reason to expect more than you can give. And don't bring plants into your garden that will injure the growth of the others, especially the Central One. Just a little garden with a few plants, well-cultivated, gives the most happiness I opine.

The old-fashioned method of cultivation was the best, no doubt, where mere propagation was desired, but those who wish the finest flowers, and especially luscious fruits for their own table, are recommended to the new "Karezza" method. Some authorities are against this, but after seventeen years trial the present writer has no fault to find or disappointments to record.

But whatever the method it is a reproach for any gardener to let a love-plant die.

And the greatest mistake the varietist gardeners ever make is to suppose that love cannot be cultivated, helped or hindered—that it is altogether a wild, instinctive, irresponsible thing. As a fact love is as manageable as muscle, if you are resolute to be above it.

A true man rides his passions like a horse (ashamed to be thrown or run away with) and uses a curb but no spurs.

The arrogance of the "Chicago Tribune" is amazing. After hinting that the members of the Cuban constitutional convention voted as they did in order to continue receiving their per diem of $10, the "Tribune" says:

"The President has no authority to modify the substance of the Platt resolutions. They are the law of the land, which he must enforce. The convention may yet decide to send a commission to Washington. Should it do so the President will receive the commission with great courtesy, will listen to whatever it has to say, and will inform its members with polite firmness that it is not in his power to revise the action of Congress."

Law of what land? Are the laws of this land already assumed to be binding on Cuba? Do not overlook the courtesy and polite firmness claimed for our President. He belongs to the "polite classes," a term which applies to persons who are polite as to trifles, but who are greedy boors and robbers as regards the things essential to life.

Mr. Schwab, the million dollar a year manager of the steel trust, tells young men that success may be attained by working longer than the agreed time for an employer. It might be suggested that the way for a dealer in steel to succeed is to throw in a ton, now and then, more than the contract calls for. But the steel mills do not need to do this, having a monopoly. Mr. Schwab is opposed to labor unions, which are but attempts at monopoly, the aim being that only the contract amount of labor shall be delivered and no more, which aim is exactly like that of the steel trust. Trusts take so much of labor products that they are utterly conscienceless in demanding more, as a gift or by extortion, they are not particular which.

The degeneracy of Christian ethics, if Rev. W. S. Ament is to be a guide, disgraces the new century. Mr. Ament is the divine who failed to refute the charges made by "Mark Twain" about looting the Chinese. According to the "Chicago Chronicle" of May 13 Mr. Ament admits accepting $300 of the sum received for the contents of the palace of Prince Hsi (sold by the looters) but justifies this because he used the money to feed Chinese Christians. Mr. Ament is optimistic, and sees much good resulting from this murdering and looting in China, and believes "the interests of the Christian Church have been furthered," because the heathens learned to respect the bravery of the missionaries, and he hopes this respect will lead to conversions. All this leads us back five hundred years or more when bravery and strength were the sole tests of right and truth.

I felt very sad after reading "News from Nowhere" by William Morris. When Ellen faded away and the poor tramp representing the ignorant servility of the present age, appeared to my view, I knew the dream was finished, and the change from that picture of a nearly perfect society to the present insane turmoil was a great shock.

According to this book there will be little toil and no trouble in England in two hundred years from the present, in fact toil itself will be a pleasure, and sought after as such, only a few of the older inhabitants understanding what individual ownership means, each person living in any house that suited him, if there happened to be room.

While reflecting on the parting from Ellen, who, though forty-two years of age, appeared about twenty according to our standard, and regretting that the dreamer could not bring her back with him to this age, for a sample product of a better era, and to help along the work of reform, I fell so nearly into a trance that I thought the occasion a good one to see how people will fare in three centuries hence, instead of two, and believing our people would prefer to patronize home trances, I resolved to remain right here, and proceed with the trance.

Of course I was much surprised at the appearance of Chicago. All the tall buildings were gone, the result of the adoption of the single tax system two hundred years before, under Mayor Carter Harrison, the last of a long line of mayors of that name. The office fell into desuetude during his life, as a result of the single tax reform, as did all other offices.

The only problem I found bothering the people was lack of work. The competition for it I thought greater than in the nineteenth century. But the result was different, as there was no such thing as wages. Every one worked for the fun of it, and there was not enough fun of that kind to go round. I inquired why men were allowed to invent machines. The reply was that invention became hereditary, and whole families took their recreation in that way, and no one was privileged to stop them. I said what about the natural law that men will seek to satisfy their desires with the least exertion, and learned that the law was still believed to hold good, but the desire for work became the more intense as work grew scarce, thus growing by what it failed to feed on.

When I arrived a dozen well-dressed men and women made a dash for my satchel, each desiring to exert their muscles a little as well as to be friendly. On getting aboard a street car I noticed quite a turmoil at the motor-lever. I soon learned that the motorman had left his post for a moment to get an ice-cream soda, and a dozen people rushed to take his place. Gallantry prevailed, and I noticed that the car was controlled by a very pretty woman of about sixty years of age. When the motorman returned he was greeted derisively and told to go down to the lake shore. I soon learned what that meant.

Everywhere I noticed the same friendly strife for a chance to perform labor. All sorts of games were in constant progress, but did not satisfy very long, as the element of usefulness must be added to exertion else it soon became wearisome. I visited a hall where the sages were inventing new kinds of labor. They took their exercise that way.

The great mass of the people seemed to care little for abstract problems. When any luckless individual lost his opportunity to work, it was considered a great joke, and he was told to "go and pound sand," an expression which I thought I had heard in the nineteenth century on similiar occasions. I then visited the lake front where the sand was pounded, and saw an immense horde of people with mauls exerting themselves on a long heap of sand along the shore. A few were heaping up the sand as it became scattered by the pounders, and others were busy in shops near by making and repairing mauls. There were not implements enough to supply the demand. All was orderly. The numerous "waiters" were in a regular line, and when anyone dropped his maul, the first in line hastened to take it up.

Just as I was reflecting that every age has its problems, my trance ended.

"Where are We At."

There are just three attitudes for rational human beings to take towards the social order, or disorder, with which we find ourselves daily and hourly environed, or confronted:

First, an attitude of endorsement, of approval and of support, by word or deed, more or less pronounced and positive.

Second, an attitude of indifference, of laissez faire; an attitude based on the belief that whatever is is right, or at least a belief that no efforts of ours can materially change the general aggregate of human happiness and misery; a belief that human evolution is a very slow process and that it cannot be hastened, or retarded, by conscious human effort. Or, if we are believers in theology, in the supernatural, in the "Creation" theory, the miraculous theory instead of the natural hypothesis or the "Evolution" theory, we may put the responsibility of everything wholly upon a supposed "Infinite Intelligence," an omnipotent and omniscient personal (consciously personal) entity commonly, yet vaguely, called "God," and thus console ourselves with the reflection that in "God's own time" all wrongs will be righted, and everybody made happy.

A third attitude is one of dissatisfaction, of unrest, of discontent, of protest—an attitude of more or less active revolt—of revolutionary iconoclasm.

Whether we will it so or not we necessarily find ourselves occupying the ground represented by one or more of these three attitudes—either continuously or by turns. To be consistent with one's self—TO STAND TOGETHER with one's self (which is the etymological meaning of "consistency," is always desirable; is one of the evidences of mental sanity, although we all know that many a man or woman is condemned to the mad-house because of the consistency as well as the persistence of his or her mental vagaries.

Speaking for myself alone; without a word of condemnation for those who choose the attitude numbered one or two, I confess to a strong preference for attitude number three. Organized and environed as I have been and now am, I cannot be other than a rebel, a heretic, an iconoclast, a breaker of idols—of ideals, that have been set up by men whose main effort seems to have been to rule their fellow-human beings, and by ruling exploit or rob others of their equitable share of the earth and its opportunities.

Marriage and Divorce.

Never before, perhaps, since the dawn of authentic history, has the subject of the conjugal relation of women and men received so much attention, in the public forum, as now. And very proper and logical it is that thinking minds of all grades and shades of thought should turn their attention to this question, for it needs no argument to show that the conjugal relation involves and includes the "issues of life and death," as does no other human relation. All experience shows that the love-live has more to do with the happiness or misery of adult human beings than does any other relation, and no fact in nature is more patent to our comprehension than is the fact that it is through the love relation of adults that the race is propagated or reproduced from generation to generation and from age to age.

Far more important, then, than the right adjustment of the differences between employe and employer, between debtor and creditor, between landlord and tenant, between religious sect and religious sect, or between religion and rationalism—or any other question that now divides and makes miserable the people of all lands and climes, is the right adjustment of the relation of woman to man and man to woman.

For these reasons I hail as an omen of good for humankind the phenomenal interest everywhere taken in the divorce of Professor Herron, the eminent lecturer and writer, and his remarriage with Miss Rand—with all superstitious rites, vows and promises eliminated from the ceremony, if such it may be called.

That this elimination of superstition from what the priests of both church and state consider a sacred or sacramental relation has aroused the fear and the anger of the governing classes, the parasitic classes, is to be expected, and is really a good omen. "Self-preservation is the first law of nature," and the instinct of self-preservation tells these parasitic classes that if they lose control of reproduction through control of marriage and divorce they will soon be compelled to work for a living side by side with the despised toilers in field, in mine and factory.

Among the papers that are giving space and prominence to the Herron divorce and remarriage is the young but lusty "Chicago American." In a recent editorial the following language is used:

> Professor Herron's friends insist that he is a cruelly misunderstood character. Most people, on the contrary, think that he is just beginning to be understood, or, in other words, found out.
>
> Dr. Herron is a professional reformer. As such he has had even more than the reformer's normal share of bitterness and uncharitableness. No words have been too hard for him to apply to people who have differed from him. But it does not seem to have occurred to him that a reformer is under any obligations to set an example himself.
>
> In his statement to Mr. Le Gallienne Dr. Herron said:
> "Love marries us, and as long as our love lasts love will keep us together. We think it wrong to obey a law that would keep us together longer than that—that would keep us together when love had ended."
>
> This is typical of all the man's utterances. What "we" want to do seems to fill his whole mind. Nowhere is there any conception of a duty higher than that to self. Nowhere is there a glimmer of realization of responsibilities assumed. Four children brought into the world by Herron without asking their consent are deprived of a father's care.
> We say nothing of the deserted wife. But the children at least are not to blame for the fact that the "law of love" has turned their father's fancy in new directions. If he had not been eaten up with selfish conceit he would have sacrificed some of his delicate sensibilities for their sake and continued to be true to the woman whom he once thought good enough to be their mother.

I attended a course of lectures by Pro. Herron and can testify that the above criticism does him great injustice. It is because he wishes to be "true" to the woman who had taken his name, and to her children, that he refused to live in an unloving relation; that he preferred to let her go free to form a new relation with some man better able to make her happy. Prof. Herron recognized the mother's paramount right to the guardianship of her children, but it is utterly false to say that he has no "realization of responsibilities assumed." That he has provided munificently for the support of his former wife and her children is well known.

In the same paper, dated June 3. The longest editorial article is by "Rev." Thomas B. Gregory, under the title "Wives and Companions," evidently aimed at the Herron-Rand marriage, part of which article reads as follows:

> The word "wife" is now about to retire to make room for a more up-to-date term—"companion." "I take thee to be my wife" must change to this: "I take you to be my companion." Instead of the homely formula: "So long as ye both shall live," the parson or Justice must say: "So long as you both shall like."
>
> In other words, provision must be made, at the beginning, for the easy dissolution of the bond which, in the foolish days of old, was supposed to be inviolable and eternal.
>
> It is not pleasant for creatures so sensitive and refined as "companions" usually are to be forced to live together after they have found out that they have lost their "affinities," "soul attractions" and their general all-around "power of assimilating."
>
> The better part of valor is discretion; and so the propagandists of the New Thought would be discreet, and provide, well in advance, for a happy deliverance from the ills of the infelicitous companionship.
>
> I am powerless in the case; but I am at least able and determined to throw out my little opinion, which is none other than this: that the day whereon the "companion" supplants the wife will be the darkest day that this old world ever saw.
>
> The invasion of the Goths and Vandals, or the inroads of the terrible Huns, was a piece of great good fortune compared with the havoc that will be played by the "companion" idea, if it ever gets a strong enough hold on the popular mind.
>
> It would damn us to the stews of promiscuity and to the physical and moral degradation of a universal brotheldom.
> It would practical destroy the home, turning its sacred precincts into a sort of rendezvous and general lounging place for all who might chance to be attracted thither by their "affinities."

Later in his article this reverend defender of the "eternal" marriage-bond system says, "It was the 'companion' business that wiped out the great peoples around the Mediterranean and along the Nile and Euphrates."

The greatest of these peoples were the Romans, and here is what the historian Maine has to say of the position of women in Rome before the advent of Christianity, with its canon law marriages.

> No society which preserves any tincture of Christian institutions is likely to restore to married women the personal liberty conferred on them by middle Roman law. Canon law [indissoluble marriage law] has deeply injured civilization.

It was not till the Roman people had been debased and weakened by "Christian institutions," and by the monopoly of wealth in the hands of a few, that they fell an easy prey to the more free and vigorous Goths, Vandals and Huns.

It is believed by many that the doctrine of hell keeps men from indulgence in gross vices and crimes, and that it is therefore useful and necessary. This man Gregory professes not to believe in hell but evidently thinks that it is the "inviolable and eternal" marriage code that keeps "us"—including himself, of course—from "the stews of promiscuity and the physical and moral degradation of universal brotheldom."

"As a man thinketh so is he!" If nothing but marriage bondage will keep this "reverend" from worse than beastly abuse of the reproductive function, then perhaps he had better hold to marriage as it is, provided he can find a woman of like depraved tastes with himself, but he and she should not try to bind others to this medieval Christian code, any more than he should be himself compelled to accept the doctrine of hell when he no longer needs it to prevent him from revelling in vice and crime.

Notes and Comments.

The longest and most important original article in this week's Lucifer is Mr. Lloyd's contribution to the symposium asked for in regard to the death of love—the saddest of all deaths because without love life itself is a boon not worth having. A truer verse never was written than that which reads thus:

> "Love is life's end, an end yet never ending;
> Love's life's reward, rewarded in rewarding.
> Hence from thy wretched heart fond care remove—
> If e'er thou liv'st but once love's worth to prove > Thou wilt not love to live unless thou live to love."

Among the many apostles of love in freedom, as against orthodox sex-slavery, there are few if any whose opinions are more worthy of attention than are those of J. William Lloyd, and right glad am I that, without special request from this office, he has responded to the general invitation to give us his best thought on this pivotal question. Some years ago Mr. Lloyd wrote us at some length on this same general subject, advocating what he termed Central, or Pivotal Loves and also Side Loves, or subsidiary passional attractions. This idea, or ideal, is again set forth in the article entitled "In Love's Garden"—a very beautiful and fitting comparison, as I think. And while the whole article is good enough for reperusal, again and again, I wish particularly to call attention to one brief paragraph:

> "The truth is that all loving is limited, and all lovers are limited, and all flowering and fruiting is limited. Love the unlimited all you please, worship it and reach for it, but use common sense, and kindly and considerately fit yourself to the actual. Remember that choosing is refusing, devotion is exclusion, and that everything costs its price."

If the philosophy inculcated herein could be heeded and utilized by all women and men, there would be fewer broken hearts, wrecked homes and blighted lives, than now.

IS LOVE DIVINE?

The selection on first page of this issue was inserted because of its excellent presentation of the general nature of the emotion known as love; not because I endorse all the statements and forms of expression used therein. Instead of heredity counting for but "twenty-five per cent" of human traits, it would be much nearer the truth, as I view it, to say that heredity counts for ninety per cent, and post-natal training for ten per cent. Instead of "Love is a divine law" it would be better, as I think, to say that love is a natural attraction. The word "divine" is open to the same objection as the kindred word "God." To the average understanding it means something supernatural, something outside of nature, beyond or superior to nature. Much the same objection holds as to the word "law." To most people law implies a law-maker; in other words, it means arbitrary rule; something entirely different from natural causation. Barring these and other minor points that might be raised the first page article is one of rare excellence.

WANTED: Owing to unusual calls for that number we ask our friends who may have a copy of number 863—May 4, that they do not care to keep, to send it to us, for which kindness we will gladly pay in stamps or literature, at the rate of five cents each.

Light-Bearer Library No. II.

"The Strike of the Strassburg Geese, by R. B. Kerr, and Other Allegories," is the title of the Light-Bearer Library number eleven, now in press. Price five cents per copy, or fifty cents for the volume of twelve numbers.

A Daniel Come to Judgment.

Le Peuple, the organ of the Brussels Workmen's party, has the following remarkable judgment of Mr. Magnaud, a Judge at Chateau-Thierry, which may be commended to Judges in dealing with the numerous cases of child-killing by women in England.

Taking into consideration that it has been proved that on the night of July 5 or 6, 1900 at Virly, in the Commune of St. Gengoulph, Marie Julie V—— brought a living child into the world:

Taking into consideration that, failing to tie the umbilical cord, the death of this child took place as the result of a violent hemorrhage;

Taking into consideration that by hiding the fact of her delivery, and by not calling in the aid under such critical circumstances of her relations, who were in the house, the accused was guilty of neglect and of imprudence, which the want of experience and the suffering of a first confinement cannot altogether excuse;

Taking into consideration that these facts constitute the crime of homicide through carelessness, recognised and punished by Article 310 of the penal code;

But, taking into consideration that before punishing, the right and duty of a Judge is to trace back with the greatest care the true causes, the initial causes of the infractions of the penal code which Society demands that he should repress;

That, in this case, it is precisely Society itself, as organized at present, which is in great part responsible for the offence committed by Marie V——;

That she declares, that in hiding the facts of her pregnancy and her delivery, even from her family, she was only acting under the fear of the secret hostility and of the stupid and cruel reprobation which generally falls to the lot of unmarried mothers, as if maternity, rightly understood, did not elevate morally every woman who feels its pains and its joys;

That, if present day Society had not inculcated and did not still inculcate, a scorn of the unmarried mother, this latter would not have to blush and would not think of hiding her condition;

That it is therefore on Society, so contemptuous towards the unmarried mother and so indulgent towards her seducer, that lies the greater part of the responsibility in the consequences, so often fatal to the child, of concealment of pregnancies and of confinements;

Taking into consideration that the incontestable fault of Society, which pursues, lessens considerably the fault of the person pursued;

That, consequently, from every point of view, circumstances peculiarly extenuating exist in favor of the accused; and there is an opportunity of allowing her to benefit to a great extent by the benevolent tendency of Article 463 of the Penal Code, as also of Articles 1 and 2 of the law of March 26, 1901;

That it is only to be regretted that Marie V——, as she acknowledges now, did not possess enough independence of character and of heart to rise above such deplorable prejudices, the cause of so many crimes and offences against childhood, and to understand that the unmarried mother who exercises every maternal virtue deserves all the more respect, in that she has to bear almost always alone the whole burden of her maternity;

Taking into consideration besides that, as long as the woman in Society occupies an inferior position to that of the man, she ought not, equitably, to incur the same serious responsibilities as does he who keeps her in subjection;

For these reasons,

Marie V——is sentenced to pay a fine of 16f. and costs.

The execution of the sentence of punishment is suspended.

Laughter as a Cure.

At a recent banquet of the National Wholesale Druggists' Association in Chicago the Rev. Frank Crane compared the respective remedial qualities of laughter. Some of his epigrams were these:

"Man is the only animal that was made to laugh, and as science teaches that laughter is a sure boon to health, it is a sin for us to substitute excessive drug taking for laughter."

"Laughter increases the blood circulation."

"It enlarges the heart."

"It expands the lungs."

"It jiggers the diaphragm."

"It promotes the circulation of the spleen."

"I once knew a man who laughed so much that when he died they had to cut his liver out and kill it with a club."

"Beware of theologians who have no sense of mirth; they are not altogether human."

"Keep your chin up."

"Don't take your troubles to bed with you; hang them on a chair with your trousers or drop them into a glass of water with your teeth."—The Telephone.

VARIOUS VOICES.

F. L. Poland, Rixmiller, Ohio:—Enclosed find sixty cents for which send me as many copies of "Coming Woman," by Lillie D. White, as you can afford. I never saw a better paper than Lucifer—not even for ten dollars per year, and wish it could be circulated throughout the entire world. I send a list of names of intelligent people who might give Lucifer their support if they could see a sample copy.

[The "Coming Woman" is number eight of the Light-Bearer Library, price five cents each, or fifty cents per volume of twelve monthly numbers, making a book of nearly five hundred pages for half a dollar. The size and shape of these monthly numbers make them very suitable for carrying in the pocket and reading at odd spells or while riding on the cars. Send to us for list of subjects treated of in this unique series of handsomely gotten up pamphlets.]

L. V. Pinney, Winsted, Conn.:—If the enclosed contribution meets your approval, please put it into your paper and give me credit. If, owing to pressure of other matter you cannot use it, please return it post-paid at once, with such change as you see fit to make. I believe that the facts stated in this paper can be verified and that any one of your thousands of readers would be glad to get hold of it. My wife and daughter both think well of it, and agree with others that they can never get enough, but it may not be to your taste.

[The "contribution" referred to in this somewhat ambiguous letter was in the shape of a dollar "greenback" or "silver certificate" issued by the United States Treasury department. Friend Pinney is an old newspaper man and likes to perpetrate a joke occasionally. Practical jokes of this kind are always very welcome when Lucifer's editor happens to be the victim. M. H.]

Emma Wardlaw Best, Isle Moyenne, Seychelles, Indian Ocean:—Your last six numbers, I think, were even better than ordinary—which is saying much. I send you a clipping, which I think just suitable for your paper. It is of course quite impossible for a man to know what a woman endures who brings an illegitimate child into the world, or even for one woman to understand the position of another; otherwise I consider this judgment as perfect as possible. I never saw the numbers of your paper which referred to the "Protest Against Marriage," of Mr. Wastall and myself, so was unable to reply to criticism.

[Our friend and subscriber, formerly of England, now of the Antipodes, will please accept thanks for the clipping, also for good words of appreciation. The "judgment" she speaks of is the decision of the judge in the case of the woman whose "illegitimate" child died for lack of proper care at birth—reproduced in this issue, from Le Peuple. The "Protest Against Marriage" alluded to was published by us some three years ago, and is the declaration of principles announced by Madame E. W. Best and Arthur Wastall, when entering upon the conjugal relation. In this declaration the right to live together in their own way, without asking leave of church or state authority, was clearly and logically maintained. M. H.]

Combination Offers.

LIGHT-BEARER LIBRARY—Monthly magazine, forty-eight pages each, price of twelve numbers (ten of which are now ready) fifty cents—and Lucifer one year of fifty-two numbers, price one dollar, will both be sent to new subscribers for one dollar and twenty-five cents. LUCIFER FIFTY CENTS PER YEAR.

To meet the universal demand for CHEAPNESS in literature we now offer Lucifer one year, of fifty-two numbers, for fifty cents to new subscribers in clubs of five or more; or five years ahead to one subscriber, whether old or new, for two dollars and fifty cents. Will not our "Committee of Ways and Means,"—which committee includes all our helpful co-operators everywhere, make a note of this and act accordingly? We send out many hundreds of samples free, every week, and from this lavish sowing of seed-thoughts we reap a small harvest of subscribers. Will not our friends whose work and that of Lucifer are one and the same, put forth a little effort to secure yearly subscribers, as well as trial subscribers, to these winged seed-sowers?

LIGHT-BEARER LIBRARY NO. TEN.

of New Series, contains "Marriage—an address delivered by Juliet H. Severance at the International Congress of Freethinkers, in Chicago, October 4 1893." Price of single copy five cents. Price of the Library, per year of twelve numbers, fifty cents.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

Fiction is today the best medium for the preacher of righteousness who addresses humanity.—From the Preface.

THE

British Barbarians

Grant Allen, the author of this Hill-Top Novel, is dead, but the book lives and will live long to startle, impress, and convince the men and women, boys and girls into whose hands it may come. Daring, brilliant, unconventional, pleasing, thoughtful, it was assailed with a storm of vituperation by the Jean-nette Gilders of the literary world; it spoke truth, and the truth, when dealing with social crimes and follies, is never forgiven by those who write either for "society" or the rabble. Nevertheless, "The British Barbarians" found an appreciative audience of thousands, and its versatile, scientific, and erudite author, by means of this fascinating work, was enabled to again earn the gratitude of the progressive no less than the detestation of the reactionary.

We send the book postpaid for only $1. Address Moses Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill.

The New Hedonism.

By Grant Allen. "The Old Asceticism said: 'Be Virtuous and You Will Be Happy.' The New Hedonism says: 'Be Happy and You Will Be Virtuous.'" This is the key note of Grant Allen's Masterpiece. 30 large pages, five cents For sale at this office.

Hill-Top Literature.

The books listed below—all of them—are the productions of the foremost thinkers and writers on sociologic problems. Every one is written in plain, forcible and interesting style and fearlessly attacks time honored superstitions which hinder the normal development of what is best in the human species.

"A Hill-Top novel," says Grant Allen, "is one which raises a protest in favor of purity." Not, however, the supposed purity of ignorance, but the purity of knowledge, of courage, of progress and of freedom.

"The British Barbarians." By Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth; 281 pages. $1.

The Woman Who Did. By Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth $1.

The New Hedonism. By Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says, 'Be happy, and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; Twelve copies 50 cents. Single copy, 5 cents

What The Young Need to Know: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. By Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers: 42 large pages. 10 cents.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love, including the first biennial proceedings of The Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers: 307 pages. 25 cents.

Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses. By Edwin C. Walker. Paper cover; 54 large pages 15 cents.

Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations. By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. 386 pages. Cloth. $1.

Cityless and Countryless World. By Herman Olerich. Read it and you will see why Bellamy's paternalistic ideas never can be practicalized. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on the sides and back; nearly 400 pages. $1.

Address M. HARMAN, 500 Fulton street, Chicago, Ill.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODESTY.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A consideration of the origin of clothes and the reasons why people wear clothing. Here are a few questions it answers:

What is modesty? What is the cause of it? What is the use of it? What is the cause of the feeling of shame? Is nudity immodest? What is the cause of the notion that it is shameful to expose some parts of the body? Why do not all peoples agree as to what parts of the body should be concealed? 5 cents.

HELEN WILMANS,

Who has tested her ideas and is now reaping a rich reward from them financially, has written out the secret of her success and printed it in a book called "THE CONQUEST OF POVERTY." Forty thousand copies of which sold before it was fairly off the press. Paper 50 cents. Address Freedom Publishing Co., Sea Breeze, Florida.

A PHYSICIAN IN THE HOUSE.

A New Family Medical Work, by Dr. J. H. Greer.

This book is up-to-date in every particular.
It will save you hundreds of dollars in doctors' bills.
It tells you how to cure yourself by simple and harmless home remedies.
It recommends no poisonous or dangerous drugs.
It teaches how to save health and life by safe methods.
It teaches prevention—that it is better to know how to live and avoid disease than to take any medicine as a cure.
It is not an advertisement and has no medicine to sell.
It has hundreds of excellent recipes for the cure of the various diseases.
It has 16 colored plates, showing different parts of the human body.
The chapter on Painless Midwifery is worth its weight in gold to women.
The "Care of Children" is something every mother ought to read.
It teaches the value of Air, Sunshine, and Water as medicines.
It contains valuable information for the married.
This book cannot fail to please you. If you are looking for health by the safest and easiest means, do not delay getting it. It has eight hundred pages, is neatly bound in cloth with gold letters, and will be sent by mail or express, prepaid to any address for $2.50. Address M. Harman, 500 Fulton Street Chicago, Ill

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price cloth, $1.

TO SLAVE AND PRINCE.

And though art but a serf, a slave, sayest thou,
A bending drudge, a weed upon life's lea,
And thinkst but little of thyself, I see;
Yet to thy doom the proudest prince must bow,
And wait thy slow escape from yoke and plow,
E'er he can rise to heights where Godhood dwells.

Where voice of all earth's saved in anthem swells
Sonorous at the crowning victory;
O Prince, do you doubt? Then know the truth:
'Tis written clear on every passing day,
'Tis marked on every stone that points the way,
And has been since the Earth was in her youth:
No soul shall wholly drain salvation's cup
'Till all, yea every one, are lifted up.

Sexual Starvation.

BY E. B. FOOTE, M. D.

Occasionally we hear of men effecting great cures by the "laying on of hands," and the response is often playfully made, "Pshaw! He only cures women!" While this is not strictly true, and while the male magnopath sometimes effects cures by imparting his healthy magnetism to a debilitated person of his own sex, it is nevertheless a fact that a majority of his cures are effected in cases of women; the simple reason for which is, that the want of masculine magnetism led to the nervous derangements, which, in turn, produced the diseases, from which they seek relief. In any given case we may not always find the invalid to be a single woman. She may be the wife of a sickly man, who generates scarcely enough magnetism to keep his own vital machinery in motion, and if he give off any, it is of a devitalized quality; she may be the wife of a husband who is magnetically repulsive to her; the husband and wife may be so much alike in temperament, that the forces eachgenerates have, by years of contact, become similar in character or quality. In any such cases, if the wife goes to the magnopath, and he manipulates with his magnetic hand some part of her body which has become the seat of disease, she receives benefit and possibly experiences an entire cure. She receives what her system required, for the time being at least, and she revives. Women often cure male invalids by the "laying on of hands," "magnetic manipulation," etc. I once saw a letter from one conservative gentleman to his equally conservative brother, in which, after telling how much he had suffered from nervous prostration, he said: "I have experienced marked relief from Mrs.——'s rubbings, which put the animal magnetism into me, and hey are more powerful and reviving than any electrica battery. You," he continued, "may laugh at this, but I, as one who has suffered so much, and received such decided relief, and in so short a time, could not doubt her wonderful power." This letter was shown to me with quite an expression of incredulity by the party to whom it was written, but its contents were not all surprising, for the philosophy of the whole thing was entirely familiar to my mind. I had been cogniznat of many cures of male invalids by the hands of female magnopaths.

Cases of disease produced by sexual starvation are not so common with the masculine as with the feminine sex. The late Dr. William McLaury, in an address before the Society of Medical Jurisprudence and State Medicine in 1886, said that "some of the most affectionate, loving girls ever born into life have gone down to despair and suicide, through remorse and self-condemnation at their inability to control their love for men perhaps wholly unworthy. Miss Phelps says no man can realize the agonies women suffer from fifteen to thirty, that is, from the nubile age to marriage. Maudsley, in "Body and Mind," says: "Although women bear sexual excesses better than men do, yet they suffer more than men by the entire deprivation of social intercourse. Sexual starvation is a condition in which either men or women may reach a state when they will sacrifice everything dear in life to them to appease that appetite—money, property, friends, family, reputation, and even the hope of eternal bliss. To prevent or appease this morbid craving of a natural appetite," continues Dr. McLaury, "it is only necessary that the sexes should commingle without too much restraint by conversing, singing, dancing, or even kissing in a decent, orderly manner; but too much law and rigor in things that pertain to the love-nature is worse than none at all, as we all know forbidden fruit is eagerly sought. As a dignified matron once expressed it, 'If it was a sin to take a drink of water, what a luxury it would be!'"

I have said that cases of sexual starvation are not as common with the masculine as with the feminine sex. Why, Mother Nature cannot tell, but undoubtedly Mother Grundy can. Men only are allowed to make advances—they do all the courting—often shabbily—but they do it all; they even allure young and thoughtless girls into trouble; get drunk; swear; chew tobacco, etc., without greatly affecting their personal or family respectability. They may become the fathers of illegitimate children, with the applause of the vulgar, the harmless jests of their associates, and the mild censure of staid people; while the mothers of illegitimate children are turned out of good socie y, and frequently from their mother's door, without shelter for themselves or the innocent victim of their thoughtlessness. With all their privileges and opportunities, however, I have met with some men, old as well as young, of conscientious or bashful traits of character, or without social opportunities, who were really suffering from physical derangements caused by sexual starvation. There are those who think they should bestow no attention upon a young woman unless with the intention of marriage, and their moral nature revolts at association with disreputable women. There are conscientious young men in large villages and cities, who, not having opportunity for introduction into good society, live as isolated from women as hermits, having no other society than that of men with whom they are employed. Many of these, however, are finally conquered by their instinctive longing for the society and magnetism of the opposite sex, and, denied the society of the good and respectable, they lay their conscientious scruples at the feet of the harlots.

Years ago the "New York Tribune," in speaking of the social life of young men, made some remarks which might appropriately find place here, for there has been little or no change for the better. The editor was calling attention to the large and increasing number of youths between fifteen and thirty years of age in our large cities who were without resident friends or kindred, "striving to conquer a foothold, and," exclaimed the writer, "how hard the contest! What daily widening gaps between those who have succeeded and those just entering the field! Neither the religion nor the social enjoyment of our prosperous men seems broad enough to include their employes. Look at the growth of aristocracy and seclusion; the world of folly, luxury, and fashion; the enormous cost of subsistence; the meagre salaries in vogue, and see what chance of comfort or sympathetic ease the town has to proffer her clerks, apprentices, and students. Herded together in the beds and attics of boarding-houses, shut out from the happy homes established by long residence and success, they are almost driven to the public saloons for light and warmth, and for that friendly companionship" (and I will add magnetism) "which, either for good or evil, youth instinctively craves and will obtain.

"The employers are surrounded with all the appurtenances which make virtue attractive. The employes are not only urged into vice by their discomforts, but it is vice alone which tenders them an alluring hospitality. She sets forth her convenient bar-rooms, her billiard tables, her concert saloons, her houses of prostitution—in all of which we will find a merry welcome." It may be added that the young men of larger means and opportunities have their clubs, and the more favored individuals of the other sex have their exclusive association, each not only giving facility to sexual isolation, but rather encouraging the same.

Young men crowd the beer saloons where "pretty waiter-girls" are employed, and really simply for magnetic association with women. Lager, wine, or some other beverage is called for, and often drank reluctantly, for they wish it to appear that the drink is what they are after, at least to those who observe them descending or ascending the steps of the saloon. Sometimes the contents of the glasses are left undisturbed. Many of these young men enter with no libidinous intentions. They feel thirsty or hungry for something, they hardly know what; it is not whiskey—it is not beer—it is not tobacco—all these they may purchase at almost any corner, and the tobacco may be chewed or smoked in the streets. No, nothing will satisfy the physical and soul yearnings but the magnetism of women. They may not have thought of this element—they may never have asked themselves, or anybody else, what animal and sexual magnetism is; they may never have thought of any such thing; but here they get what they hanker for without asking the name or quality of the article.

THE SECRET OF SEXUAL ATTRACTION.

People of both sexes generally recognize the fact of sexual attraction; few have given the least attention to the subtle element which constitutes it. This element if investigated, is found not only to be a nutrient, but a stimulant more potent than alcohol, and naturally possessing none of the injurious proprieties of the latter. It gives vigor, and, in reality, it imparts erectile power to all the tissues of the body, and aids in producing and preserving plumpness of form. It stimulates ambition, imparts elasticity to the muscles, and brilliancy to the eye, of those who are favored with its influence. Both sexes have an appetite for it, and frequently without knowing it. They long for something, they know not what, and seek to appease an indefinable desire by resorting to narcotics, stimulants, and nervines. Herein drunkennesss has an incentive, which has perhaps never before been thought of; but it is a fact that, with the imperfect social arrangements which characterize our so-called civilization, and which attempt to regulate the social intercourse of the sexes, men and women go up and down the earth famishing for something they cannot, or will not, tell you what—and finally, in their blind search for what their systems crave, take to liquor, tobacco, or opium.—From Home Cyclopedia of Medical, Social and Sexual Science.

Our "Superiority."

BY A. C.

Aunt Elmina again comes to the front to prove on purely biological grounds that women are the superior sex. There are a great many more facts from which to draw inferences. For instance, women with diabetes always have girls; never boys. Shall we conclude that diabetes is a "superior condition," or that women-children, being a product of diseased conditions, are abnormal?

Briefly, the facts are these: Male and female have been evolved through a process of division of labor. Many low forms of life have no sex, one organism reproduces its kind. This organism is more nearly female than male, drawing its fecundating elements from its environment, or producing them in its own organism, gradually the two offices are separated into two organisms, and the higher we climb in the course of development the more marked is this differentiation.

The female is anabolic; her life is more quiescent, more fully nourished. The male is katabolic; more energetic, nervous, active. The male furnishes the vital spark, the female embodies it. Biologically considered, the female is conservative, preserving the type; the male is progressive, departing from tradition. The tendency to vary is a male quality.

Anabolic conditions—ease, plenty of food and warmth—tend to produce females. Katabolic conditions,—cold, famine, hard conditions generally—tend to produce males.

Now if nutrition is superior to action, if conservatism is superior to radicalism, if eating and sleeping are more commendable than getting out and "hustling"—then let us women boast of our biological superiority!

But why talk of superiority at all, between two beings so essential to each other? As well might oxygen and nitrogen quarrel as to which is the most important part of air!

It is impossible for a man with a good heart to be satisfied with this world as it now is. No man can truly enjoy even what he earns knowing that millions of his fellow men are in misery and want. When we think of the famished, we feel that it is almost heartless to eat. To meet the ragged and shivering makes one almost ashamed to be well dressed and warm. One feels as though his heart was as cold as their bodies.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Sayings—No 2.

BY FRANCIS BARRY.

Next to showing marriage to be a system of impurity and outrage, it is incumbent upon the friends of Woman's Emancipation to give good evidence that instead of being selfish and sensual, clamorous for cheap opportunities, they are earnest workers for the overthrow of a dire evil that is the greatest stumbling block in the way of human advancement, and the heaviest load that is holding the race in degradation and slavery.

As slavery is the greatest evil, freedom, without restriction, is the greatest beneficence. Every man, woman, and child, animal, insect and reptile, has a right to absolute and unconditional freedom. But the rabble do not know the difference between freedom and invasion. The moment I trespass in the least degree upon the least right of any being, that moment I violate freedom.

Reciprocity is the only essential to sexual purity. The average husband has yet to develope to the plane of the bull and the stallion. The advocates of marriage entertain the infamous sentiment that legalized rape, which marriage is, is better than freedom. In freedom there will be no impure relations, for every woman will be intimate only with the man, or men, to whom she is most attracted.

A pure-minded woman will be intimate with two men that she loves, rather than with one she does not love; and every pure-minded person will endorse this sentiment.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton makes the truthful statement that the relation between men and women in all time has been one of rape. I affirm that forty-nine fiftieths of the rape has been perpetrated in the marriage bed; and the other fiftieth by wretches possessed of the marriage spirit. With free opportunities for all, high and low, there would be no rape.

There are two classes of men—Free lovers and blackguards. The man who theoretically and practically, recognizes woman's right to her own body, is a free lover. The man who says it is not safe to allow woman her freedom—that my mother, my lover, my daughter would be impure and vile if she had opportunity, is a blackguard of the meanest sort.

I have no sympathy with the monstrous idea that a passional relationship, for a parentive or any other purpose, is admissable by arbitrary arrangement in conformity to the decision of a scientific expert.

For beneficent results in parentage I would rather have the unrestrained impulse of the most illiterate woman living, than the combined wisdom of the savants of Christendom.

I believe in the temperamental adaptation, and I believe the strongest attraction is the surest index.

With a large blanket for herself and a small one for her baby the free woman may pity the victim of marriage though she dress in silks and fare sumptuously every day.

Freedom in a cottage or a hovel, is better than marriage in a mansion. When marriage is destroyed freedom is achieved.

The self-ownership of woman constitutes the abolition of marriage.

Cure of Disease and Crime.

Let us for fifty years study heredity, and leave theology alone; and at the end of the five decades our doxology will be a victorious pean over the vanquishing of disease and crime. But in the meantime, in the name of the father, son and holy ghost, we go on marrying wastrel to wastrel, consumption to consumption, intemperance to intemperance, cancer to cancer, idiocy to idiocy, and wonder that the progeny has only body enough to nurse disease and only will sufficient to indulge in crime. We ignore the laws of existence and environment, and with our own hands make the whips with which nature scourges us. We starve because we have not force enough to survive in the keen competition of "the survival of the fittest"; and, venomous as serpents and stupid as asses, we turn round upon those who are the fittest, just as reasonably as Snowdon might quarrel with the Alps because of their superior height o you elevate woman by setting her to the task of breeding blockheads? Are you likely to improve a race by enfeebling the minds of the mothers of that race by an insidious administration of Jewish fables, administered in the holy name of religion? What sort of mental and ethical stamina do you expect in a child whose mother was a religious imbecile and whose father was a moral hypocrite?—Saladin.

DR. FOOTE'S HOME CYCLOPEDIA OF POPULAR MEDICAL, SOCIAL AND SEXUAL SCIENCE, by Edward B. Foote, M. D., illustrated, 1200 pages, price $2. Murray Hill Publishing Co., 129 East 28th Street, New York. For sale at Lucifer Office.

A distinguished clergyman once said of "Plain Home Talk," written by this author, that it was so comprehensive it might well take the place of all other books in his library. Well, this large volume of over 1,200 profusely illustrated pages contains not only all that is of especial interest in "Plain Home Talk," but over 500 pages of new matter, replete with information for the family. It is well-named—"Home Cyclopedia," for with its comprehensive index the reader can readily turn to an examination of any subject which is uppermost in his mind and find a wealth of facts and theories regarding it. Dr. Foote's former work had not only the warmest endorsements of clergymen, physicians and editors, but all people in every station in life. This one will have especial value in the hands of the advocates of race culture. One physician has written to the author, "if every adult in the civilized world could read, understand, and would follow out your views, in a few generations there would be a world of physical, intellectual and moral giants."—The chapter on Restricted Marriage and Parentage possesses especial value to stirpiculturists. A plan is therein unfolded which seems entirely practicable for the human family to have fewer and better children—a reform in family life greatly to be desired. In the pages treating of psychic medicine, animal magnetism, etc., may be found the real secret of the alleged cures effected by Christian and Mental Scientists. The scientific information given by the author is extremely interesting and instructive. Moreover, it can be understood by the most illiterate individual if he can read at all. Dr. Foote has the happy faculty of rendering the most abstruse subjects entirely comprehensible to the non-professional mind, and consequently the "Home Cyclopedia" may be of the greatest practical value to those in the humblest spheres of life. It is by far the most comprehensive exponent of the laws of right living that has come under our observation. As a hygienic instructor alone, it is worth many times its advertised price.

A GENTLE REMINDER. Will our friends and subscribers kindly remember that it takes money, and a good deal of money, to publish a radical weekly paper in a large city? Please remember also that Lucifer has no "Sustaining Fund," no "Sustaining Club," as have nearly all other radical papers. That it depends wholly upon equitable co-operation,—dues on subscription and sale of its pamphlets and other literature, and not on donations, for the means of meeting its weekly and monthly bills. We are now entering the twenty-second year of publication under the same editorial management, consequently Lucifer is no mushroom growth, no infant of yesterday, but notwithstanding its years it cannot live without the constant helpful effort of those who believe in its work,—who believe in the necessity of persistent, never-ending agitation of the question of BETTER IDEALS, as well as better conditions, for the building of a better race of human beings, in order that the evils of our present social and economic life may be removed. DEBT is a hard task-master; will our friends do what they can to save Lucifer from such bondage?

The Battle Is On!

Not in the memory of living men and women have the foundations of our bastard civilization been so severely tried as now. Men, and women too, long before Prof. Geo. D. Herron was heard of, have taught and practiced substantially the same views as now promulgated by him. Much has been done by other rebels against priest-made marriage, but the time never seemed so ripe for concerted action looking towards the overthrow of what John Stuart Mill calls "the only form of serfdom now authorized by law," as at the present moment.

The shaking up given to this form of serfdom, this hoary-headed relic of barbarism, by the discussions of what is historically known as the "Beecher Scandal" some thirty years ago; the teachings of Robert Owen and his son Robert Dale; the writings and lectures of Stephen Pearl Andrews, of Henry James and others of like views; the experiment in sociology at Oneida, New York, under J. H. Noyes; the writings and speeches of the sisters Woodhull and Claflin, together with those of many more whose names could be mentioned—all these have doubtless prepared the way for a champion such as Herron to marshall the forces of social revolution as they have probably never been marshalled before.

The fact that the ecclesiastical court that tried Herron declined to bring a charge of heresy against him, but confined itself to charges of "unchristian conduct"—meaning his separation from his wife and his remarriage with Miss Rand, is a pointer of great significance. It means neither more nor less than that the church has about given up the fight over matters of faith, and is now about to stake its existence as a social force upon its power to hold men and women in subjection to its authority in the realm of morals, and especially in the realm of reproduction—the realm of sex-activities.

The following from the Chicago "Record-Herald" of June 6, is a fair sample of the utterances of the conservative press in regard to the Herron trial and its results. The editorial is headed "The Casting Out of Herron:"

The council of Congregationalists at Grinnell, Iowa, set the modern churches a fine example in dignified tolerance and ecclesiastical wisdom in expelling Professor Herron without making a martyr of him. Herron has been kicked out of the church and ministry after the formality of a regular church trial, and yet the most irrational sympathizer with religious dissenters or scoffers can discover no halo about his head.

No maudlin sentimentalist or blasphemer can claim that Herron was persecuted because of his dissent from accepted beliefs or creeds. He cannot even claim the stigma of "heretic," as there was nothing in the trial that invited a disclosure of his peculiar beliefs. He was merely tried on the charges of unchristian conduct, and these charges were sustained by such abundant evidence that the vote for his expulsion was unanimous and was given without discussion or controversy.

There is little doubt that the personal notoriety that would result from an opportunity to defend his peculiar views of the marriage relation would have been very pleasing to Herron. Being denied the "distinction" of a trial for heresy the erratic professor was obliged to content himself with a lengthy and labored communication to the council, in which he denounces the present marriage system, declaring that he does not believe it "is sacred or good." His letter is a strange exhibit of moral delinquency and irrational views of life. To justify his desertion of wife and children he indulges in much meaningless jargon of high sounding phrases.

No mystical phrases about the marriage relation can condone in the public mind the offense of Herron against public morals and common decency. His unwillingness to recognize the parental obligation to the children he brought into the world is the inexplicable phase of his insanity, and places upon him the stamp of infamy.

HERRON TO HIS INQUISITORS.

Prof. Herron wrote a letter to the court that tried him, of which the following are characteristic paragraphs:

PARAMOUNT RIGHT OF THE MOTHER.

I would ask you to kindly let me explain however, that I did not desert my children. No father loves his children more than I. But I have long held it a principle that children belong first to their mother. Where such a separation takes place, if the mother desires all the children, they are rightfully hers, and no considerate man would take one of them from her. Besides, in this case, I think the children would choose their mother, who has been their constant companion, except when she was twice absent with me in Europe. They are not babes, but are arriving at some years of capacity to choose for themselves—the oldest of them just blossoming into womanhood. This may not be known to you, because of the fact that I have not yet reached middle life; but it may be understood when you take into account the fact that the marriage annulled took place before I had quite reached my twenty-first birthday. Furthermore, when I turn from the desires of a father's heart to what is best for the children themselves, I think their choice of their mother would be wise; for they will have a good mother, and the life of a man given to the socialist revolution cannot fail to be more or less the life of an outcast, as the revolution intensifies and arrays a ruling-class against a working-class in a final issue and crisis.

MARRIAGE SYSTEM NEITHER SACRED NOR GOOD.

As a council, you are acting in defense of what you believe to be the sacredness of the family institution, against which I am to you an offender. In order that your action on this point may be complete, let me say to you that I do not believe that the present marriage system is sacred or good. It rather seems to me to be the destruction of the liberty and love and truth which make life sacred and worth while. If love and truth are the basis of morality, then a marriage system which makes one human being the property of another, without regard to the well-being of either the owned or the owner seems to me to be the very soul of blasphemy and immorality.

A SURVIVAL OF SLAVERY.

The family founded on force is a survival of slavery, and one of the expressions of the slave principles on which our whole civilization is built. It is a mode of the superstition which thinks it good for human beings to own each other, and good for the race to have all its sources and tools of life owned by the few who are strong and cunning enough to possess them. The ethics of the legally and ecclesiastically enforced family make it possible for a man to live a life of monstrous wrong, of ghastly falsehood, even of unbridled lust, and yet be highly moral according to the standards by which we are judged. The same standards condemn and disgrace the purest expressions of comradeship, if they cross the convention or forget the decrees of custom. Free and truthful living is thus made a tragedy, to have overwhelming and revengeful retribution added unto it, while slave-living and falsehood may be rewarded with world-blessings and ecclesiastical canonization. I thoroughly believe in the vital and abiding union of one man with one woman as a true basis of the family life.

A FREE FAMILY THE FIRST NEED.

But we shall have few such unions until we shall have a free family. Men and women must be economically free—free to use their powers to the fullest extent—free from the interference of legal and ecclesiastical force, and free to correct their mistakes, before we can have a family that is noble, built on unions that are good. Lives that are essentially ones, co-operative in the love and truth that make oneness, need no law of state or church to bind or keep them together. Upon such, the imposition of force is a destruction and a blasphemy. On the other hand, no law in the universe has a right to keep together those who are not vitally and essentially one. It is only in freedom that love can find its own, or truth blossom in the soul, or other than a slave-individuality unfold.

MORALITY OF SLAVES AND LIARS.

Love must be set free and liberty must be trusted, if noble and beautiful homes are to spring up to make the earth a garden of truth and gladness. The coercive family system is filling the earth with falsehood and hypocrisy, misery and soul disintegration, and is perpetuating the morality of slaves and liars. In times past, men have thrown away their lives in protest against what seemed to them tyranny and wrong. There is a new world coming whose way can be made ready only by those who will throw away their good names, and accept, perhaps, everlasting disgrace, as the price of their protest. And if I willingly accept all the obloquy and retribution which church and society may visit upon me, in making a protest against a system that seems to me destructive of all true morality, and to the very citadel of the soul's integrity, then my protest has earned its right to be heard.

NAKED TRUTH AGAINST CIVILIZATION.

Under our social system, no one says what he really thinks, or lives out what he really is. Our sayings and doings, or the things we do not and say not, are guided by the desire to be respectable, to be approved; hence action and thought are alike dishonest, and without freedom or beauty. Our religion and conduct, our customs and good names, our international diplomacies and business successes, deal with chances and appearances; they are a matter of the dice, and not of the soul. Civilization, with its network of falsehood and suspicion, of retribution and revenge, is a sort of world-conspiracy against the soul's integrity and against individuality. Yet the right of a single soul to fully and freely express itself, to live out and show forth all the truth about itself, so that it need have within itself no hid thing, but be naked before the universe and not be ashamed, is infinitely more important than the whole fabric of civilization. The travail of the soul to become honest, the struggle of man to come to himself, is far more vital and revolutionary, more menacing to what we call civilization, than any questioning of the marriage system, or the questioning of any institution. You may be sure that when the son of man rises out of the common life, there will not be left a shred of any kind of institutional bond, and there will be no sentinels on the walls of the soul's possibilities.

From all parts of this country come papers marked with comments upon Herron and his work. In far away lands, wherever the English language is spoken, come the echoes of his utterances, as for instance, the following clipped from "The Century," Adelaide, South Australia:

"Mr. M. Harman, criticising these lectures of January and February last, in his splendid little Chicago 'Light-Bearer,' speaks of Professor Herron as iterating and reiterating the statement that 'socialism is a road, not a goal,' and that the goal to which socialism leads is the 'free individuality of each human being.' This is really Harman's own teaching in all the splendid newspaper and pamphleteering work which he and his compeers are pressing forward in America; it is the same teaching that saturates the writing of that grand Florida woman, Mrs. Wilmans; it is the same teaching that flashes through every page of 'The Century;' and that will go on, all through this new era upon which we have entered, kindling and consuming Error of every kind in the flames of its everlasting burning, and leaving the grand Truth clear and unveiled, like gold seven times purified—that Co-operation, Brotherly-kindness, Helpfulness, and Love are milestones on the great open road of the spirit that leads to Life's Throne—the divinity of the individual in the unveiling of the I AM!

"Herron breaks bread on higher mountain-tops, for men and women who dare to leave the plains of conventional thought and climb there after him. And there are tens of thousands who are climbing. He frequently tells his hearers—says comrade Harman—in effect at least, that we must not stop with the Jesus of the 'synoptic gospels,' but should reach out, as that teacher himself exhorted his disciples, for something still higher and better. There was no Finality in Jesus. There is no finality anywhere or in anything. That is one of the first principles of the spiritual life that he taught—it stands in the Child's First Primer, how could the Master forget it?

"Prof. Herron dares distinctly to assert the truth that no man and no god is good enough or wise enough to follow as Authority. That to be 'merely obedient to Authority is to have the soul of a slave.' That 'Authority has always been Truth's deadliest enemy—never its protection—always its tomb.'"

If the Press-Writers do not accept the challenges everywhere thrown out by the defenders of canon law marriage in the Herron case, they will certainly lose the opportunity of their lives.

Current Notes.

AT THE LUCIFER CLUB.

Among the proceedings at the last meeting of the Lucifer Club was a very emphatic endorsement of the objects and general methods of the Press-Writers' Association. Letters were read from Dr. J. B. Wilson, president of the National Secular Union and Freethought Federation, and from D. Webster Groh, one of the original advocates of the plan for more systematic methods of educating the public mind through the press, and thereby causing the public conscience to resist invasion of personal rights of the peaceable citizen by organizations claiming to be the special guardians of public morality. In response to a suggestion that a little special effort to sustain the paper during the summer months, and to enable the editor to devote more of his time to getting out his autobiography, a very handsome contribution in cash was made by members and visitors, and for which sincerest thanks are hereby returned.

NEXT MEETING.

The next meeting of the Lucifer Club will be held on the evening of Tuesday June 25, instead of June 18 as first announced. The address will be delivered by Emma Goldman of New York; subject, The Failure of Free Unions. Public cordially invited. Time of opening 7.45 P. M.—sharp. Place, Lucifer's office, 500 Fulton St., one block north of Union Park. Take Lake Street Elevated to Ashland Avenue, walk one block north and one east to St. John's Court. Or, take Fulton street surface cars at Adams and State, and get off at our door.

VISITORS AT THE CLUB.

Among the visitors from a distance, at our last meeting was Dr. Ella Slater of the Osteopathic Institute, Odd Fellows Bldg. St. Louis. Having taken treatment for some weeks at that Institute I speak from personal knowledge when recommending this institute, its managers and methods of cure, to the readers of Lucifer. Other welcome visitors were Mr. Frank Weller of Mitchell, S. D., and J. C. Collins of New Glarus, Wisconsin. All these have long been readers and generous helpers of Lucifer and its work.

"The Strike of the Strassburg Geese, by R. B. Kerr, and Other Allegories," is the title of number eleven of the Light-Bearer Library now being mailed to subscribers and exchanges. Price five cents each; per volume of twelve numbers fifty cents.

More About the Press-Writers. No. IV.

BY FRANCIS B. LIVESEY.

1. Everybody has heard of the marriage of Prof. Herron to Miss Rand in New York on May 25. The affair went off in as utter disregard of law and orthodoxy as could be desired. The Professor did the very best that could be done under the circumstances. If it is an earnest of what we may expect from Socialism, then surely orthodox marriages will be among the things that Socialism will abolish. This marriage is a reminder that there should be some press writing done by the few able persons present. For instance "The Baltimore Sun," of May 31 gives the following:

THE "NEW THOUGHT" IN ACTUAL LIFE.

"'Prof. George D. Herron,' observes the 'New Haven Register,' the leader of the 'new thought' and an experimental socialist, having successfully separated himself from his first wife and four children, announced Monday evening to a party of assembled friends that he would take Miss Rand as his 'companion,' and she remarked that she would take him for her 'companion,' whereupon they were pronounced 'man and wife' by an up-country clergyman.

"This was all done upon the theory that society has no right to compel genius to be burdened by family ties when they become burdensome. In other words, Prof. Herron owes no obligation to the woman who first bore his name and brought his children into the world. We by no means propose to discuss this performance. It is not discussable. Every right-thinking man and woman, whether moralists or not, know that this sort of thing will not square with the commonest decencies of life."

Now there was present at this unique marriage the following persons: Rev. W. T. Brown, Rochester, New York; Dr. Charles Brodie Patterson, New York City; Mrs. E. D. Rand; Richard Le Gallienne; Edwin Markham and wife; Leonard D. Abbott; Bolton Hall; William Mailly; Thurston Brown; Mr. and Mrs. Darwin J. Meserole; Mabel McCoy Irwin, and Margaret Wren. Now, all the above persons should at once write the "New Haven Register" and the "Baltimore Sun" in defense of Prof. Herron, not that he needs the defense, so much as to indicate the principles of liberty which he represents. And they should not only do this in regard to these papers, but in regard to all papers that published anything derogatory of him. This is the way to bring reform home to people and allows opportunity to get in red hot work while things are hot. A poem from Markham and a fable from Hall are grand things, but a few straight and simple lines are all that is necessary in these cases.

2. King Edward wants "free press" far above any king or potentate I hear of. He could give William I of America points. William O'Brien's paper—"The Irish People"—was suspended for severely criticising the king. When the king heard of it he ordered that there should be no further suppression of publications for anything that they might say. Papers have been suppressed in both Manila and Havana and editors have been deported and imprisoned, yet William I. has issued no proclamation decreeing that this country shall not be Russia. Those small minded Americans who cry "stop my paper" upon the appearance of reform articles in the regular papers, can also be notified by the Liberal Press-Writers that King Edward has just set an example that they also can in their puny spheres follow.

3. Press Writers must not hurriedly condemn editors, in fact, it is about as well to let our worst grievances against them go unmentioned—that is the secular editors. On May 2 I sent a letter to the Providence "Sunday Journal." I enclosed five cents for a copy of the paper, or for the return of my letter. Not hearing from it, on May 22 I sent it a postal. On May 31 I received a copy of the paper dated May 5, containing my letter. Thus it is seen that my letter was immediatelely published and that careless clerks in the office, or more likely in the postoffice lost the paper. The letter in question, by the by, was a criticism of Rev. Anthony Bilkovosky, pastor Universalist church, 329 E. 22nd. St., Baltimore. "The Baltimore American" prints him under big headlines and refuses my replies. I had previously answered him in another paper and he wrote me for a copy. I remembered him and told him to send me $2 and I would send him my "Journal" letter in circular form in large abundance. When a man can't be answered in one city, try another, Brothers, but be sure to let him and his best friends know it. Judge Lowell, of Boston, recently "roasted" the postal authorities. Socialists cannot safely point to the department as a sample of the working order of their theory. It is becoming very disgusting.

4. "Congressman Robert W. Taylor, of Lisbon, Ohio, has decided to make divorce reform his life work. He believes that each member of Congress should apply his time and talents to bringing about a certain desired result, to stand in after years as a monument to his energy. Mr. Taylor was directed toward his chosen line of endeavor through the work that devolved upon him in connection with the contest against the seating of Congressman Brigham H. Roberts, of Utah. This caused him to make an exhaustive study of the subject law and led him to the belief that there is urgent necessity for reform legislation in the United States.

"Mr. Taylor introduced in the last session of Congress a resolution declaring for a modification of the constitution that would pave the way for uniform marriage and divorce laws, but owing to the pressure of business could secure no action upon it. He says he will take up the work again next session and keep at it so long as he remains in Congress if necessary. The recent decision of the United States Supreme Court bringing into prominence the conflict between the laws in the several States has emphasized his belief that the cause he has taken up is worthy of most earnest effort."

I clip the above from the "Public School Journal," of Cincinnati, for May. Mr. Taylor is a Republican. I became aware that he intended to make a great splurge at the last Congress and immediately sent letters and circulars to him, to his friends, to his papers and to Senators. The papers of his town are "Patriot," "Buckeye State," "Journal" and "Republican Leader." In all courthouse towns, like Lisbon, there are the clerk of the court, state's attorney and other officers to whom I always send matter affecting one of the citizens. Everything then gets well aired. I commend all Press-Writers to do the same. I wrote to several senators regarding Mr. Taylor and one of the very leading men wrote me that he would watch him up. Mr. Taylor thinks crime will be lessened by the passage of his measures. It will only be greatly increased. E. C. Walker and all other able writers on this line should apply themselves to the little details by which such men as Taylor can be easily circumvented. These men who want to build "monuments" to themselves at the expense of liberty, virtue and happiness cannot be too closely watched, nor too thoroughly downed.

5. Comstock has captured a Christian Scientist. He is no less a man than Thomas J. Shelton, editor of "Christian," Denver, Colo. Mr. Shelton issues a monthly, having some fifty thousand subscribers. He got "obscene," of course, like all others noted for their purity, and twenty-five dollar fine was his punishment. His arrest and conviction came about in the old way also—spite work on the part of enemies—his enemies being other Christian Scientists. He says: "The advertising given me has been worth $25,000. 'What fools these mortals be,' even when claiming to be Christian Scientists." The printer of "Discontent" was fined about one hundred dollars. Even that was less than a penitentiary term. Is it possible that our agitation of Comstockism is gradually diminishing the penalties?

6. The best memorial that we can build to Ingersoll will be the abolition of Comstockism, or the undoing of what Robert allowed to be done under his nose in the hey-day of his power. One hundred thousand dollars ought to be put up to help men who are leaving no stone unturned under which to find the crawling snakes of Comstock. Every time that Comstock comes to this state I take the opportunity to touch him up. He was in Baltimore the other day and I followed him with a brief letter in the "Baltimore World" of May 25, under the heading of "Comstock and Purity." Both the clergy and the press treated Comstock with considerable levity. As a means of showing writers like James and Walker how simply we must get in the big dailies, I will here give my "World" letter:

"'Editor The World:' Mr. Comstock was questioned the other day by Rev. Wm. A Crawford-Frost quite unceremoniously. It was before the Itinerants' Club. Mr. Comstock evidently thinks that obscene literature is about the chief cause of crime. But Mr. Comstock prepares the ground in the young for the reception of this literature. He would have the young brought up in almost total ignorance of certain bodily functions. He would deem it a sin for a child to see any part of the 'human form divine,' save the hands and the head. He would throw such an air of mystery about the human form that the child would be impressed with a secret desire to unravel it. When the vender of the obscene came along the child would, therefore, grasp the opportunity with avidity. Hence, crime.

"All this is wrong. Children should be brought up in perfect naturalness. Children so brought up would feel no incitements whatever and the vender of the obscene would sow his seed on barren soil. Between Mr. Comstock's plan, the school tendencies and the obscene vender we see what we see. The trinity is responsible for the crime. Nobody else."

7. English Bishop Joseph G. Hartzell, Missionary Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Africa is quoted in the Cincinnati "Weekly Enquirer" along a line that ought to be very gratifying to "Koresh." Here is his say:

"There is a world crisis in progress in Christianity and civilization. We are face to face with conditions never before encountered. Missionaries and explorers have gone to the farthest corners of the earth and have routed out what may almost be termed the oldest and most secluded peoples. They stand in defiant championship of their ancient creeds and territory. All through Africa I have seen signs of this revolt of the barbaric nations. Great Britain is experiencing it in Ashanti. All along that west coast, so rich in gold and so rapidly being invaded by European capital, the natives need but a spark to set alight aggressive fanaticism that years could scarcely suppress."

Exactly! Coupled with the possibility of a revolt in heathendom is the same in the civilized countries. The power of orthodoxy is already being shaken, and Press-Writers have only to avail of constant occurrences to bring it down in tottering ruins.

VARIOUS VOICES.

M. R. Fish, Mays Landing, New Jersey:—Your little gem, "Motherhood in Freedom" strikes to the root. Wish I had another copy to loan; don't like to part with the one I have. Were it possible for me to express my appreciation of your and Lillian's life work for the uplifting of humanity I would be truly thankful.

A. Ladynski, Marysville, Cal.:—Enclosed find $3.00. $1.00 for subscription on Lucifer and $2.00 for Dr. Foote's "Home Cyclopedia." Although I do not agree altogether with your ideas in regard to the emancipation of womankind, Lucifer and the "Torch of Reason" are the most welcome papers to me and I read with great interest every article in both papers. Are there any subscribers in this neighborhood for your paper?

[Will our subscribers in or near to Marysville respond to this inquiry?]

Elsie Cole Wilcox, Lawrence, Wash.:—The symposium on Ella's letter has drawn out many excellent ideas from some of our "women folks." But oh! women are so slow to recognize the church as the "old man of the sea" who clings about their necks with a death grip. I have for years, contended that the first step in the emancipation of woman from sex slavery, is to free her from the God idea. And no great progress can be made until this is accomplished. But how timid they are! How enthusiastic in defence of their "religion!" But the "world do move," and we must keep pegging away.

J. Newton Wood, Adelaide, S. Australia:—God speed your noble little paper. You will see by exchange that I make free use of it. Send me any of your own books that you care to entrust to me for sale here in Australia, and I will advertise them free in "Century" and leaflets, and remit to you from time to time. You lead in America—we are beginning to follow. There is no Australian depot for American "Hill-Top" literature. I have a hope that I will be able to establish one.

[Our far away contemporary will please accept sincerest thanks for the words of appreciation, and for a copy of his paper, "Century," an eight-page bimonthly journal published at Adelaide, South Australia. In size of page and amount of reading matter it resembles Lucifer. It is mainly devoted to discussions of economics, collective ownership of public utilities and kindred subjects, and yet it is hospitable to discussions that look for bedrock causes of all our social ills—as when the editor says, "If Edwin Markham is right, and 'better born babies is the solution of the industrial problem,' it may be found, before the century is much older, that the solvent is potent even to the extent of crime and lunacy." We will send books for the depot of American "Hill Top" literature. M. H.]

Chas. Thonger, Niagara, Ont.:—As editors like some praise as well as most people I will say that on the whole, while there is much in your paper that I think is mistaken "morality" I cannot find much fault with the manner in which it is expressed. It gives the impression of sincerity and of a good foundation on which a sound morality may be built up. It gives no food for babes; and seems to prefer the naked truth to aproned lies. Sometime I hope to pay you a visit and to find you enjoying some profitable leisure.

[Thanks for what seems a candid opinion of Lucifer. Yes, what is needed more than anything else is the "naked truth." Without this—honest, fearless expression of truth as we see it, but little progress can be made in removing the wrongs that afflict our common humanity. We are always glad to see our friends and hope Friend Thonger will not fail to give us a call.]

Mrs. J. Van Der Cammen, Chattanooga, Tenn.:—Enclosed please find money order for $2.50 for which send me a copy of your Autobiography and use the other dollar for distributing samples of Lucifer; the fifty cents for Light-Bearer Library. I did not get any Lucifers for the past four weeks and miss them so much. I have often failed to get the paper one week at a time on account of wrapper not being addressed correctly. Have you any more photographs taken with flashlight? I would like to get the 1900 bound copy of Lucifer if you have any later on. I enclose stamps for reply.

[We have had our mailing list reset in linotype, and by some one's negligence most of the Tennessee list and also the Texas list were left out. We much regret this, and will try hard to see that all such blunders are avoided in future. We will gladly send duplicate copies to all who failed to get all the numbers, provided we have them in office. We still have a few of the "flashlight" pictures, price fifty cents, I think. We have no bound copies of Lucifer for the year 1900, but if enough calls are made for them we will have a few bound soon. The price will be $1.75, postpaid, the postage being about twenty-five cents. We still have a few volumes of 1899 left, at same price. M. H.]

A PHYSICIAN IN THE HOUSE. A New Family Medical Work, by Dr. J. H. Greer. This book is up-to-date in every particular. It will save you hundreds of dollars in doctors' bills. It tells you how to cure yourself by simple and harmless home remedies. It recommends no poisonous or dangerous drugs. It teaches how to save health and life by safe methods. It teaches prevention—that it is better to know how to live and avoid disease than to take any medicine as a cure. It is not an advertisement and has no medicine to sell. It has hundreds of excellent recipes for the cure of the various diseases. It has 16 colored plates showing different parts of the human body. The chapter on Painless Midwifery is worth its weight in gold to women. The "Care of Children" is something every mother ought to read. It teaches the value of Air, Sunshine, and Water as medicines. It contains valuable information for the married. This book cannot fail to please you. If you are looking for health by the safest and easiest means, do not delay getting it. It has eight hundred pages, is neatly bound in cloth, with gold letters, and will be sent by mail or express, prepaid to any address, for $2.75.

MARRIAGE AND MORALITY. Lillian Harman. 5c.

MARTYRDOM OF MAN. Winwood Reade. This is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how war and religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for liberty; and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. Winwood Reade's reputation as a writer of fine English, of deep study and careful reasoning, needs no word of praise. Cloth, $1.

MEN, WOMEN, AND GODS. Helen H. Gardener. With preface by Col. R. G. Ingersoll. Contents: Introduction by Col. Ingersoll. Men, Women, and Gods. Vicarious Atonement. Historical Facts and Theological Fictions. Appendix. Address to the Clergy and Others. Letter to Cleveland Congress of Freethinkers. The only authorized and correct edition. Large 12mo, heavy-toned paper. Portrait. This volume is by far the best writing this famous author ever did. It is very fine. Cloth, $1; paper, 50c.

MISSING LINK IN MODERN SPIRITUALISM, THE. A. Leah (Fox) Underhill. With portraits of the Fox Sisters and others. 478 pages. Cloth. Reduced to $1.

Lloyd, Platt, and the Pitiful Facts; Social Radicals and Parentage; Anthropology and Monogamy; Love and Trust Versus Fear; Reflections upon Reading William Platt's "Women, Love, and Life."

PERSONAL RIGHTS AND SEXUAL WRONGS. Oswald Dawson. 20c.

REGENERATION OF SOCIETY. Lillian Harman. 5c.

RELIGION AND RATIONALISM. The relation of each to human liberty. The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. E. C. Walker. 5c.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Thomas Paine. Answer to Burke's attack upon the French revolution. A political treatise of great general value, as advocating liberty and democracy. Contains the fundamental principles of true republicanism. Cloth, 50c; paper, 25c.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS. Karl Heinzen. A new edition, together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. A book of 286 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Cloth, $1.

RUBAIYAT (Quatrains) OF OMAR KHAYYAM. Edward FitzGerald's interpretation; with original introduction; special cover; latest version. Paper, 10c.

RULED BY THE TOMB. A discussion of free thought and free love. Orford Northcote. 10c.

SONGS OF THE UNBLIND CUPID. J. Wm. Lloyd. Edition de luxe. Verses printed from Kelmscott type upon deckle edged hand made paper of cerulean tint. Initial letters, ornaments and borders are in red; initial letter and sketch upon the opening page are hand painted in water colors. Covers brown, with choice of silver or gold lettering. Very handsome gift book. 20c.

TALKS ON NATURE. Important information for both sexes. Dr. J. H. Greer. 192 pages. Reduced from 50 to 25c.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says: 'Be happy and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and ascetism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 39 large pages; twelve copies, 50c. Single copy, 5c.

THE WORM TURNS. Revolutionary Poems. Voltairine de Cleyre. 10c.

THE COMING WOMAN. Lillie D. White. 5c.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE. Matilda Joslyn Gage. This is Mrs. Gage's last and crowning work. Every woman ought to read it. Every liberal woman and man will want it. A burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do. Cloth, $1.50; paper, 75c.

WHAT IS RELIGION? Ingersoll's last public address, delivered at the meeting of the Free Religious Association in Boston on June 2, 1899. To which is appended the poem, "Declaration of the Free," the last verse written by the great Freethinker. 5c.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo, 172 pages. 25c.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10c.

CHINESE MOTHER'S SONG.

O hush your cries, my baby, and rest your tired head,
For every tiny thing has crept into its cozy bed;
O hush! the winds of night will bear your plaintive cries about,
And the Christian man will get you if you don't watch out.

O hush your cries, your father dear is hiding in the hills;
He's hiding from the priests that make our fields run bloody rills;
With Bible and with musket they're converting all about—
The mission man will get you if you don't watch out.

And if you're caught, the love wherewith the Buddha fills the mind
They'll turn to smiling falsehood, covering hatred of your kind;
O hush! with cross and Bible they are prowling all about—
And they'll civilize you, baby, if you don't watch out!

Is Prostitution a Necessary Social Institution?

BY AUGUST BEBEL.

Marriage represents one-half of the sexual life of the bourgeois world, and prostitution represents the other. Marriage is the front, and prostitution the back, of the medal. When a man finds no satisfaction in marriage he generally resorts to prostitution, and when a man for one reason or another remains unmarried, it is again prostitution to which he has resource. Provision is thus made for men who are celibates by choice or by force, as well as for those whom marriage has disappointed, to gratify their sexual instincts in a manner forbidden to women.

Man has in all times and climes regarded the use of prostitutes as his natural and exclusive right. All the more strictly and severely does he watch over and judge every woman outside the pale of prostitution. He does not trouble himself with the consideration that a woman has precisely the same impulses as a man. In virtue of his position as master, he demands the forcible suppression of her intensest instincts, and makes her chastity the condition of marriage and social eligibility. Nothing can afford a more drastic and at the same time more revolting illustration of the subjection of woman to man, than the diametrically different manner in which the gratification of the same natural impulse is regarded and judged accordingly to the sex of the person in question.

The unmarried man is particularly favored by circumstances. Nature has burdened women alone with the consequences of the act of generation, the man has the enjoyment without trouble or responsibility. This privileged position has led in the course of history to that unbridled license in sexual matters which characterizes a considerable portion of the masculine world. And legitimate gratification being, as we have already shown, prevented or checked by a hundred causes, the consequence is illegitimate gratification in the broadest sense of the word.

Prostitution becomes a necessary social institution, just as much as the police, the standing army, the church, the capitalist, etc., etc. This is no exaggeration, but an assertion that can be proved.

We have described in what light the ancient world regarded prostitution, that it considered it inevitable and organized it by State regulations, in Greece as well as in Rome. We have also quoted the opinions which prevailed on the subject during the Christian Middle Ages. Even St. Augustine, next to Paul the chief pillar of Christianity, although an ardent advocate of asceticism, could not refrain from exclaiming: "If you put down public prostitutes, the State will be overturned by the violence of passion." The provincial spiritual council in Milan, in the year 1665, expressed itself to the same effect.

Let us hear what the modern world has to say. Dr. F. S. Hugel declares in his "History, Statistics and Regulation of Prostitution in Vienna:" "Advancing civilization will gradually clothe Prostitution in more pleasing forms, but not till the end of the world will it be banished from the earth." This is saying a good deal, but it is certain that no one who is capable of looking beyond the horizon of bourgeois society, and of recognizing the changes which must take place within the community before the latter can attain to natural and healthy conditions, can fail to agree with Dr. Hugel's assertion.

For this reason Dr. Wichern, the well-known orthodox director of the Reuhe Haus, near Hamburg, Dr. Palton in Lyons, Dr. William Tait in Edinburgh, and Dr. Parent-Duchatelet in Paris (celebrated for his investigations on the subject of prostitution and venereal disease) declare unanimously: "It is impossible to eradicate Prostitution, because it is an integral part of our social institutions," and one and all demand its regulation by the State. It has not occurred to any one of these men, that we must alter the social institutions that necessitated prostitution. Their want of economic training, and their inherent prejudices make such a solution appear an impossibility to them. The "Wiener Medicinische Wochenschrift" (Viennese Medical Weekly Paper) for 1863, No. 35, asks:

"How can the large number of voluntary and involuntary celibates satisfy their natural needs otherwise than by plucking the forbidden fruit of Venus Pandemos?" and the writer comes to the conclusion that if prostitution is therefore a necessity, it has a right to existence, to exemption from punishment, and to protection by the State. Hugel expresses precisely the same opinion in the work quoted above.

The Leipzig Police Surgeon, Dr. J. Kuhn, says in his book, "Prostitution in the Nineteenth Century from the Standpoint of the Sanitary Police"; "Prostitution is not only an evil that must be endured, it is an inevitable evil, for it shields women from unfaithfulness" (of which only men have a right to be guilty) "and virtue" (of course female virtue, men have no need of any) "from being attacked (sic) and therefore from falling." These few words of Dr. Kuhn's suffice to characterize the crass egotism of men in all its nakedness. That is the proper standpoint of a police surgeon, who sacrifices himself in watching over prostitutes, in order to preserve men from unwelcome diseases.

Was I wrong, when I said prostitution is at present a necessary social institution, just as much as the police, the standing army, the church, the capitalist etc., etc.?

In the German Empire prostitution is not, as in France, sanctioned, organized and controlled by the State, but merely suffered to exist. The official brothels have been abolished by decree of the Federal Council. The consequence of this abolition was that in the second half of the last decade, numerous petitions were addressed to the Reichstag, requesting that these houses might be rehabilitated, on the ground that vice was spreading without let or hindrance, and that an alarming increase of syphilitic disease was the result. A commission appointed by the Reichstag to examine the subject, and numbering a fair contingent of doctors, concluded to recommend the petition of the Imperial Chancellor, inasmuch as the prohibition of public brothels involved the most dangerous consequences for the morality and health of society and especially for family life.

These testimonials may suffice. They prove that for modern society, the prostitution question is a sphynx, whose riddle it cannot read; it sees no way out of the difficulty but that of state sanction and control, if greater evils are to be avoided.

Thus society, which is so proud of its morality, its religion, its civilization and culture, must suffer licentiousness to permeate its body like a slow poison. But our testimonies proves something more. The Christian State makes the official declaration, that the present form of marriage is sufficient and that men have a right to seek the illegitimate gratification of their sexual impulses. This same State only recognizes the unmarried woman as a sexual being, inasmuch as she surrenders herself to illegitimate male desires, in other words, becomes a prostitute. And the surveillance and control exercised by the officers of the State do not touch the men, as they ought to do as a matter of course, if the sanitary superintendence were to have any raison d' etre and any chance of success, even if we leave the inequality of the sexes before the law in the interest of ordinary justice out of the question, but they touch the women alone.—From "Woman in the Past, Present and Future."

Light-Bearer Library No. II.

"The Strike of the Strassburg Geese, by R. B. Kerr, and Other Allegories," is the title of the Light-Bearer Library number eleven, now ready. Price five cents per copy, or fifty cents for the volume of twelve numbers.

Labor is prior to and independent of capital. Capital is only the fruit of labor, and could never have existed if labor had not first existed. Labor is the superior of capital, and deserves much the highest consideration.—Lincoln's Second Message.

More About the Press-Writers. No. V.

BY FRANCIS B. LIVESEY.

I have always contended that the sex question was of vastly more importance than the liquor question. Of course, Comstockism will not let it be discussed to any necessary extent and it goes on slaying its millions while liquor slays only its thousands. I believe the "Baltimore Sun," is one of the papers that has refused me on the sex point. Not so the brave "Baltimore World," however. But it is amusing to see how all things come to him who waits and works. The "Sun" of June 4 gave the following to the point:

LONDON'S GREATEST DANGER.

"In London there are at present 800,000 young men," writes W. S. Harwood in the June "Century." "It is demonstrated by the most careful and systematic census effort that fully 600,000 of this number do not associate themselves in religious work. It is among these 600,000 young men that the work of the London association is most pressed. I asked Mr. Putterill what was the greatest obstacle he had to overcome in reaching these young men. He told me that it was not the liquor-drinking habit, terrible as is its hold upon the young men of this vast mass, but the appalling prevalence of vice. If half is true that was told me in London about the prevalence of the most degrading habits among the young men of that city, there is little wonder that those in position to know look with the keenest apprehensions to the future—a future which promises to make the young manhood of London within these generations a physical wreck if not reinforced by fresher blood from the provinces. Indeed, there will not long be waiting such another wave of apprehension as that which has recently swept over France concerning the social situation in Paris if some check is not found against the advance of immorality in London."

Old Press-Writers are continually seeing themselves made into true prophets on all the questions of the day, just as I have seen myself in the above connection. Mr. Harwood's statement makes true another point, and states that in all civilized countries the churchman cannot succeed in numbering more than one third of the people as in sympathy with the church.

AN EDITOR ON "FREE PRESS."

The Chicago "Farmer's Voice," 334 Dearborn St., gave an article from me on "Free Speech and Free Press" in its issue of June 1. It answered me. Here is the dialogue:

F. V.: Our correspondent's idea of a free speech and a free press is not likely soon to be realized: it is to be doubted if it would benefit the world if it were.

L.: The "Voice" has done a very good share toward the realization already. I know of no farmer's paper in the country that has given so many letters on Anarchy, Socialism, Single Tax and Back to the Land. If every leading agricultural paper had accepted as many reform letters from the people as it has, we could thank them all. The "Voice" thinks we want to impose upon the papers, but we do not. We take into consideration all that they have to contend with and we ask nothing unreasonable.

F. V.: Doubtless the journal quoted could fill its pages every day with letters on religion alone—that is, upon this or that man's idea of religion—and the world might be but little the wiser for it. What the world needs is men and women who live out their religion, who do not cry it from the housetops, or proclaim it in the streets. So with the great economic and social disorders which we would correct. If men and women would think and practice more of the ideals they would set up, their influence would be infinitely greater than now, when so large a share of their time is given over to mere talk.

L.: Yes, the New York "Sun" said it could fill its pages with religious letters. I acknowledge, from many that I have seen of them, that they would be very dull. Our Press-Writers aim to confine themselves to newsy and up-to-date letters. Far in excess of the best paid writers have we first sought to "live out" our religious, or our social and economic beliefs. Mr. Groh has grandly stated this point in circular No. 2900. In fact, he says:

"Intelligent editors well know that, in a free, fair, and full discussion, error alone can lose and truth must eventually win. While articles written for pay are tempered to suit the whims and prejudices of editors and readers, those from unpaid correspondents are inspired by the philanthropic motive of correcting error and enlightening mankind.

"They are the outpourings of deep-seated conviction, from thinkers who are not afraid to speak the truths they have discovered, no matter how distasteful or unpopular. They come from brave, noble, daring men, who are not afraid of criticism, else they would never enter such an arena of public discussion. The advanced ideas they present have generally been previously tried in the fire of scathing criticism, and have all the dross eliminated therefrom, and they seek truth for truth's sake alone. In proportion as our newspapers encourage the tolerant hearing 'of their readers by their readers,' in their columns, they become less autocratic and more democratic."

There is a time to hear in the closet and a time to proclaim from the housetop. The young, mushroom paid writers, voluble in words, but not in experience, are now the ones that are allowed too often to sway the thought of the times. We protest against this. To every writer's column we demand a quarter of a column in reply, unless the intelligence of the people is to be insulted. For myself, I write on nothing that I have not experienced in sufficient measure to warrant my being heard. There is old Dr. J. C. Barnes, of Hindsboro, Ill., who has throughout a long life lived out the Anarchy he proclaims. Will anybody say that he should not be better welcomed to the press than the mushroom upstart whose services, like the lawyer's, can be put on either for the money there is in it? Men who will suffer imprisonment, sacrifice their possessions, and perhaps their lives, are certainly more worthy of being heard on subjects near and dear to the people than the mere word builders.

F. V.: Free speech does not mean endless speech; but that is what we should have if public meetings were open to everyone.

L.: The Manhattan Liberal League opens its doors to all "cranks," but matters end there in due time. Actual fools, whether on the lecture platform or in the press, are soon silenced when given full liberty. If they are not, the bump of humor is sufficiently developed in the average man to allow them all the rope they want. Even some ministers have of late years allowed questions in connection with their discourses.

F. V.: Free speech and a free press mean, to the average man, the right to give utterance to his views without fear or favor at such times and under such conditions as render his right to do so clear and unmistakable.

L.: That is about what I seek to impress upon the Press-Writers on one hand, and on editors and the public at large on the other. When a city minister comes out in defense of Comstockism to the extent of a volume, is it not the "clear and unmistakable" right of those who have suffered wrongly at his hands, and who believe him to be as much of a fraud as the minister believes him a saint, to be allowed at least a few lines in his condemnation? If Ingersoll or Paine are attacked, if blue laws are urged, is it not just and proper that those concerned should at least be heard in protest to the extent of a quarter part of the space the opposition was allowed? We are modest, and we ask only the fractional part of our dues, trusting to the power of truth, rather than to our "much speaking" for victory.

1. The "Laurel (Md.) Democrat" condemned the trusts in a long article. At the end it asked: "What is the remedy, or what are the remedies?" I took the opportunity to reply that a "free press," in which the people's voices could be heard on all things, was the remedy for this and all other evils. Then I quoted from Bro. Groh's circular No. 2900, the last half of the first paragraph and the whole of the second, fourth and fifth paragraphs. Thus it is that circulars can be advantageously quoted from. Sometimes a few lines at the head and end of a newspaper article are sufficient, with quoted clippings between, to make a strong one. Press-Writers must be one idea men and never fail to work in their "fad" for all the evils under the sun. As the suffrage is a farce, let us get at the will of the people through the press.

2. The Manhattan Liberal League is a fine thing, but it ought to have longer reports given of its proceedings, accompanied with the name and address of some officer to whom letters could be sent. All the long haired men and short haired women can then have a hearing. The extremists then meet. There should be a Liberal paper standing for all the Liberality of this League; but it don't exist. What is the reason? Is it that "talk is cheap" and it takes money to buy a printing press?

3. "Waldo" writes me he is trying to get up an anti-Comstock organization for lively work. He says: "I want to see men have the courage of their convictions, even if it does cost something, and then what they say has some weight, and I think you are the same manner of man." Exactly! But I would tell this Brother that it is impossible for me to join in work with any who are "noms." I would prefer to see only one-quarter attempted over one's name and address to what might be done over a "nom." If we cannot do all that we would like to do without danger, the plan is to do all that can be done up to that point. There is enough to do even of this. If we can't be faithful in the accomplishment of the little, we can accomplish nothing great. Let "Waldo" organize an anti-Comstock band that can spend a little brains and merely five dollars a year, a piece, in the work, and there will be plenty for them to do just on that one subject.

4. Talking about Press-Writers against Comstock, reminds me that Frank D. Blue, editor of "Vaccination," at Terre Haute, Ind., has written J. T. Small, of Provincetown, Mass., requesting him to take charge of some press work in that line. So far as I have seen Bro. Small has done more for the cause of anti-vaccination than any man in the country. He has availed of openings to carry the war into camp of the enemy everywhere. Here we are with an anti-vaccination society in Baltimore, but not a word comes from its members in the press when the onslaught on the innocents is at its height. Bro. Small has actually come down from Massachussetts, appeared in our large and small papers, and stirred up a sensation all of himself. No reformers of the day have a bigger work before them than the anti-vaccinationists. "Targets" stand around for them everywhere. They can fire in the air and hit something, and there is comparatively little ostracism or danger connected with the aggressive work that they should do. Mr. James seems to be a vaccinationist, but as he seems to have compunctions against writing for the secular press, it is hardly worth while for the antis to oppose him in his den.

A GENTLE REMINDER. Will our friends and subscribers kindly remember that it takes money, and a good deal of money, to publish a radical weekly paper in a large city? Please remember also that Lucifer has no "Sustaining Fund," no "Sustaining Club," as have nearly all other radical papers. That it depends wholly upon equitable co-operation,—dues on subscription and sale of its pamphlets and other literature, and not on donations, for the means of meeting its weekly and monthly bills. We are now entering the twenty-second year of publication under the same editorial management, consequently Lucifer is no mushroom growth, no infant of yesterday, but notwithstanding its years it cannot live without the constant helpful effort of those who believe in its work,—who believe in the necessity of persistent, never-ending agitation of the question of BETTER IDEALS, as well as better conditions, for the building of a better race of human beings, in order that the evils of our present social and economic life may be removed. DEBT is a hard task-master; will our friends do what they can to save Lucifer from such bondage?

CHANGES AND CREDITS on mailing list are now made but once each month. When, therefore, our friends do not see the number on their tabs changed promptly they will understand the cause. Our mailing list is now set by a linotype machine, hence changes and eliminations cannot be so promptly nor so cheaply attended to. No loss of numbers, however, will be sustained by subscribers, as duplicate copies will be sent to them at their new place, when notified of change.

"The Failure of So-Called Free Unions"

Will be the subject of a lecture by Emma Goldman of of New York, on the evening of Tuesday June 25, at Lucifer's rooms, 500 Fulton St. The lecture will be followed by free discussion—five minute speeches,—by members of Lucifer's club and by visitors. In order that all who wish to speak may have a chance to be heard it is urgently requested that all come EARLY, so that the lecture may begin at 7:30 P. M. sharp.

CHICAGO SOCIETY OF ANTHROPOLOGY

Will meet in the Athenæum Bldg., 26 Van Buren, Room 320, Sunday June 23, at 3:30 P. M. Subject: Phrenology as a Character Study. First speaker Dr. P. S. Replogle of this city, followed by the usual discussion by members and visitors.

A Summer Campaign.

The annual summer solstice—for this latitude—of what our popular chronology calls the first year of a new century, is now with us. Both summer and winter bring opportunities for educational work. Summer is the season of travel, of excursions, of picnics, of outings from the usual routine of daily toil.

These annual outings are favorable to social intercourse, to exchange of ideas, and it is only by exchange of ideas, that educational work is possible.

This is the twenty-second summer of Lucifer's educational work; its twenty-second summer campaign. Has anything been gained by these summers and winters of agitation of thought along unpopular lines? Anything to show for all these years of struggle against the entrenched and embattled hosts of conservatism? of conventionalism? of hoary-headed respectability? of vested rights and privileges?

As viewed by some of us who have been constant in the fight all these years there is something to show; there is much to encourage us to continue the fight while life and strength and consciousness remain.

Among the indications that our work has not been in vain are a multitude of private and personal letters received almost daily at this office, and from nearly every grand division of the planet on which we live. While I write these lines my morning mail is handed to me, containing letters of encouragement of which the following lines are a sample:

"Your editorials are grand. In Lucifer of three weeks ago, I think it was, your sentiments were so strongly yet kindly put I felt like grasping you by the hand and wishing you a hearty support from every liberal minded ego in America, yes, in the world."

The fact that George D. Herron, the eminent scholar, educator and reformer, while preaching substantially the same doctrines that Lucifer has taught for twenty years, is able to reach the ears of vast multitudes of cultured people in both hemispheres, and the fact that the conservative press and pulpit everywhere are being put on the defensive by him, these facts are among the most encouraging of the signs of the times. A private letter from one who has watched the career of Prof. Herron, especially the record of his work in New York, says, "I feel that he has been called to a greater work than he knew—the emancipation of the world from the most vital and far-reaching of all slaveries—sex bondage. It is true that the family must be placed on high—since man can only fully express himself as family, but it is the true and not the false that must be exalted."

Foremost among the available methods of work for the summer, as some of us think, is that of the Press-Writers, specimens of which, and suggestions concerning which, are given weekly in Lucifer from the pen of Francis B. Livesey. Another prominent Press-Writer, D. Webster Groh, of Hagerstown, Md., writes us as follows:

"In your columns recently Walter Breen, 309-13th. street, Omaha, Neb., kindly offered to typewrite articles for some Press-Writer. This is very generous and should be accepted by some Press-Writer living near him, as the delay in sending him the article any great distance would more likely prevent its publication than bad writing. "News"-paper editors want, above all, "fresh" matter else it's not "news" and does not belong in "news"-papers, they think. Comments should come in immediately after the article commented on has appeared, else they become stale. But why can't Walter write some comments himself and send Press-Writers marked copies of Omaha newspapers for comment thereon. Press-Writers consider all who desire to aid or join them as brothers or sisters in a common cause, and no one should hesitate to write them. The "Truth Seeker" publishes a partial list of them, and you should do like wise, so friends know who to address."

But whether the readers of Lucifer adopt the methods of the Press-Writers it is sincerely to be hoped that none will permit the summer months of the current year to pass without doing what each can do, to rouse the dormant public conscience to a sense of the evils of our present systems of associative life, and to the necessity of replacing these systems by others more in accord with the principles of Truth, Love and Wisdom.

Current Notes.

SUPERSTITION DYING—TOLSTOY.

Joseph Mitchell, a subscriber in Michigan, writes us as follows:

"I am a Russian Jew—have lived in Russia and Germany; for the past sixteen years have mingled with Yankee people. I find the the intelligent Americans love Tolstoy, and think his reform is helping not only Russia but other countries as well. Christian and Jewish superstition is dying—slowly but surely. I got rid of it about eleven years ago. The marriage system of today is also false; we must teach people the laws of nature instead of Jewish and Christian superstitions. More love and less law, is what is needed. My knowledge of English is not sufficient to express my love for Brothers Harman, Tolstoy and others who command the love of my heart."

Among our subscribers are quite a number of Russian Jews who send us words of greeting very similar to the above lines giving us assurance that there is a wide-spread revolt against the old Jewish superstitions, most of which, as is well-known, have been adopted by the Christian world. The books of the Old and New Testaments are declared by most Christian churches to be equally of divine origin and authority. Hence the death of Jewish superstitions means also the death of Christian superstitions.

"A TALE OF TWO HEARTS AND A HEAD."

Thanks to our friends who responded to the call, we have now a small surplus of number 863, containing the story entitled "A Tale of Two Hearts and a Head," and other articles of unusual value. Those who did not get a copy of this number can now be supplied so long as the surplus lasts.

"IN LOVE'S GARDEN."

Under the head "Various Voices," will be found a letter credited to "X. Y. Z," highly commending the article entitled "In Love's Garden," by J. Wm. Lloyd, published in number 868. This is but one of many similar expressions of appreciation of that article received at this office. Of similar purport is the following from the editorial department of a very popular and decidedly conservative weekly magazine published in New York City:

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND:—Enclosed please find ten cents in stamps, for which send me copies of Lucifer containing Comrade Lloyd's paper on the nature of love. I think I have never seen any statement quite so satisfactory to me on this subtle question, on which I think no one should dogmatise. The writer's "Dawn-Thought," I find, is being read with high appreciation by leading liberals here.

Among the names given of those who are reading "Dawn-Thought" with "high appreciation" are some of the most popular authors and thinkers of New York City, but which names are not given here inasmuch as our correspondent's letter is marked "private."

"WANTS THE PRACTICE."

Our good friend "X Y Z" wants "leaflets" or continued stories that give us not merely the idea but the "practice" of those who advocate sex-reform, and mentions the story called "Chains," lately run as a serial in "Discontent," and asking whether Lucifer could not reproduce the same story and put it into book form. The question is worthy of consideration, but it occurs to us to ask if "X Y Z" has ever read "Hilda's Home," first run as a serial in Lucifer and then put into book form. If not we think he will find that this realistic story tells how several women and men illustrated and practicalized in their lives many if not all the ideas inculcated in the article "In Love's Garden." This story has been read by thousands, has received hundreds of highly appreciative commendations and still the demand continues; price, cloth, $1.00 paper cover fifty cents.

MEDICAL MONOPOLY.

C. L. James's "Information Wanted," was set in type for last week's Lucifer but failed to see the light of print simply because the forms were not large enough to receive it and the letters of others whose claims to space were at least equal to those of Mr. James.

Replying to his closing suggestion first: I heartily second the amendment. Yes, read Abbott's Hygiene of Transmissible Diseases, and all other authorities on the subject of disease, its prevention and cure. I mentioned one anti-vivisection tract because it is comprehensive and cheap, and gives the opinions of educated medical doctors—regulars—as well as the opinions of a few irregulars, contemptuously called "quacks"—and thus may be truthfully said to be very suitable reading for those who care to "read all sides."

I candidly confess to a greater desire to see the literature of the "antis" circulated than to see that of the "regulars," and for much the same reason that I preferred to circulate the literature of the "Abolitionists" rather than that of the "pro-slavery" advocates, and also for the same reason that I wanted and still want to circulate Freethought papers and pamphlets rather than the literature of the Catholic and Protestant churches. The pro-slavery advocates already had the ear of the public. They had their "vested rights" and the vested rights of their class, to maintain. On the side of the abolitionists were no vested rights. So also of the revolt against the rule of the church. Churchmen have the ear of the public and are accorded many privileges that are not allowed to heretics or unbelievers. They have their vested rights to defend, their billions of untaxed church property, church schools, etc.

So also in this revolt against the rule of the medical monopoly. The regular doctors already have the ear of the public. They have enormous vested interests to defend, such interests, perquisites and privileges as irregulars are debarred from, unless they join the medical trust.

Replying briefly to some of Friend James's points, I would say:

1. Yes; Lucifer's "moderator" has tried to wield the gavel with impartiality, and has not failed to administer rebuke in the two cases named by my critic, if he will take the pains to refer to Lucifer's files.

2. While it may be true that some of the opponents of the self-styled regulars use language unbecoming a philosopher it is certainly not true that all who are called quacks by the medical monopolists and their defenders, "know better than to engage personally in the debate." For more than forty years I have discarded drug medication and have practiced upon myself and friends the quackeries known as hydropathy, natural healing, massage, mental healing, osteopathy etc., and I have good reason for thinking that all, or nearly all who have opposed, in our columns, those murderous practices, vivisection and vaccination, are likewise open to the charge of quackery, as used by medical monopolists and their apologists, such as Friend James. To my thinking drug-taking, blood-letting, vaccination, counter-irritation, etc., are quite as irrational as remedies for bodily ailments as is the prescription of the "atoning blood" for the disorders of the soul or mind.

My "authority" for saying that "regular" medical doctors, by implication, say to mankind, "Indulge your passions" etc., is found in nearly every newspaper—in such advertisements as "Lost Manhood Restored." It is found in the basic doctrines of the Allopathic school of medicine, which doctrines are based on the assumption that there is curative power in drugs—poisons, toxins. I have no authorities at hand, and no time to look them up, but my many controversies with medical doctors many years ago, were all based upon this claim on their part, and the claim on my part that nature, the vital recuperative force within the organism, cures the patient, if cured; and that drugs hinder rather than assist recovery.

My observation is that physicians of the old school do very little in the way of teaching prevention of disease, and this is just what we should expect. It is not to the interest of the "profession" that seeks a monopoly of the healing art, to teach people how to keep well; to keep them in ignorance is the medical monopolist's bounden duty to himself and his fellow craftsmen.

That the average man and woman submits to the claims, the demands, of medical monopolists is explainable on the same principle that he and she submit to be robbed by the priesthoods in the way of exemption of church property from taxation, and by salaries paid to chaplains in the public institutions, etc. All these robberies are submitted to as part of our inherited superstitions, from slavery to which we have not yet evoluted.

Once more I close by repeating what I have often said before, that all "regularly" educated physicians do not favor monopoly, and that many of them are broad-minded philanthropists whose duty or allegiance is first due to themselves as men; next to their patients and to humanity at large, and last and least to their fellow-craftsmen—instead of making it their first duty to stand to their "order," and saying, as one of them was reported not long since that it is "better that the sick should die under scientific medical treatment than that they should get well under the treatment of quacks," or words to that effect.

Information Wanted.

BY C. L. JAMES.

I have acted occasionally as "chairman or moderator of a convention of people assembled to discuss matters of common interest," and therefore understand the difficulties of the situation. Else I should inquire whether that courtesy for want of which the chair seems to rebuke me, was as scrupulously exacted from Mr. Clarkson or Mr. Walker: also, which, in the moderator's judgment, is least parliamentary,—to intimate that the other side are misinformed and imposed on by "quacks," who know better than to engage personally in the debate; or to make, with no apparent discrimination, charges directly affecting the morals of a large and generally very well reputed class? But as it is, I won't. What I want the chair to tell me is where he gets authority for the statement that the medical doctor, "by implication," or any other way, says, "Indulge your passions and appetites to your heart's content, and when the natural consequences overtake you. . . . for a reasonable consideration I'll fix you up, good as new." When I know this, I will undertake to prove that the medical doctor does no such thing; though I admit that "quacks, natural healers, osteopaths, hydropaths," who are not commonly recognized as doctors, sometimes do! I will prove the regular physician does no such thing, in the only way a negative can be proved, namely by proving a positive which involves it. I will quote, till the chair cries "Hold enough!" not from the latest works of regular physicians but the oldest, in proof that they originated all such maxims as "Prevention is better than cure," that they actually, in their zeal for healthful moral habits, exaggerate the unsatisfactory nature of remedies of diseases caused by vicious, that the hygienists who affect to supplant them, not only learned from them all they knew upon this subject, but have made the transparent blunder of taking their rhetorical flourishes to prove such absurdities as that surgery in cases of accident can be dispensed with! And that very "monopoly" of which you speak is glaring proof that "the average man and woman," though without much "erudition," has common sense enough to see this! Your parallel of vicarious sacrifice is far reaching. "The Lamb which was slain" that the people might not starve, was a type sometime before vivisection existed,—nay, even before Jesus went around practicing as a "natural healer"! Which is like him—Jesus or the vivisected animals?

Mary F. Smith informs me that she has "seen more fatal results from (soon after?) the treatment of regular diplomaed physicians than ever from that of so-called quacks." Bless your innocence, Mary, I am sure you have. I will suggest a simple explanation. When fatal results are in sight, patients call vivisectors in, and turn "so-called" quacks out! You will before you die. If it is only just before, that may very likely be bad for you. But it will neither lower the vivisectors nor exalt the "so-called" quacks—in the judgment of those who have an eye for cause and effect. Yours for experiments and more light, and against the Movement in Favor of Ignorance!

P. S.: Oh, one question more, Mr. Chairman! Why did you recommend "those who care to read all sides" to a single anti-vaccination tract, "price ten cents?" Was it because you never read a book by a "drug doctor" and did not even know the name of any? "I move to amend" by adding one—Abbott's Hygiene of Transmissible Diseases.

Non-Investigation—Prejucice

BY RHEINHOLD STARCKE.

When I at first read Mr. James' article in which he defends vivisection and also decries mental healing I was truly astonished to think that a man of his knowledge could be so poorly posted about these subjects. Also that it was written in such unkind language and so much of the Nero in it. After further consideration, however, I decided that he had only written the article to stir up the animals on the other side of the question.

Now, as to vivisection I will merely say that the greatest surgeons of the past and present have unqualifiedly condemned it as useless and cruel.

Hundreds of these utterances by these men will be cheerfully furnished you on demand by the Anti-vivisection League of America. If you wish to see the other side of the question you can get that pleasure easily, unless you are so bigoted as to think that there is nothing on the other side worth knowing.

You say that the people who get healed by the mental method had nothing the matter with them. I will let you judge the case which was very near home with me, and this case is only one of hundreds in the same locality by the same mental healer—I call him such, though he called himself a "Christian Scientist." Case: boy at two years of age; had Scarlet Fever; bad treatment by physicians; left him very deaf with bad catarrh of ears for sixteen or seventeen years—so offensive as to require syringing sometimes twice a day, but always once. Several small pieces of bone came out of one ear. Was restored in seven days by seven mental treatments; no contact; not even shaking hands.

This boy lived eighteen years in that community of 5,000 people who all knew him and still yelled at him after he could hear the finest ticking watch at seven to ten inches distance, and ordinary sounds as far as the average. They yelled at him simply from force of habit. This cure occurred fourteen years ago; his hearing has remained.

Perhaps you will call this an accident! Rather remarkable that all these people should accidentally get rid of similar troubles; also rheumatism, dyspepsia, and loathsome skin diseases. Surely you should not allow your prejudice to blind your observation.

I will grant that there are sometimes cases of hypochondria, but these also are cured (?) by drugs. The writer will furnish names on demand. He also wishes to state that he is naturally one of the most skeptical people living.

To the Person Sitting in Darkness.

Extending the Blessings-of-Civilization to our Brother who Sits in Darkness has been a good trade and paid well, on the whole; and there is money in it yet, if carefully worked—but not enough, in my judgment, to make any considerable risk advisable. The People that Sit in Darkness are getting to be too scarce—too scarce and too shy. And such darkness as is now left is really of but an indifferent quality, and not dark enough for the game. The most of those People that Sit in Darkness have been furnished with more light than was good for them or profitable for us. We have been injudicious.

The Blessings of Civilization Trust, wisely and cautiously administered, is a Daisy. There is more money in it, more territory, more sovereignty and other kinds of emolument, than there is in any other game that is played. But Christendom has been playing it badly of late years, and must certainly suffer by it, in my opinion. She has been so eager to get every stake that appeared on the green cloth, that the People who Sit in Darkness have noticed it—they have noticed it, and have begun to show alarm. They have become suspicious of the Blessings of Civilization. More—they have begun to examine them. This is not well. The Blessings of Civilization are all right, and a good commercial property; there could not be a better, in a dim light. In the right kind of light, and at a proper distance, with the goods a little out of focus, they furnish this desirable exhibit to the Gentlemen who Sit in Darkness:

Love, Law and Order, Justice, Liberty, Gentleness, equality, Christianity, Honorable Dealing, Protection to the Weak, Mercy, Temperance and Education—and so on.

There. Is it good? Sir, it is pie. It will bring into camp any idiot that sits in darkness anywhere. But not if we adulterate it. It is proper to be emphatic on that point. This brand is strictly for Export—apparently. Apparently. Privately and confidentially, it is nothing of the kind. Privately and confidentially, it is merely an outside cover, gay and pretty and attractive, displaying the special patterns of our Civilization which we reserve for Home Consumption, while inside the bale is the Actual Thing that the Customer Sitting in Darkness buys with his blood and tears and land and liberty. That Actual Thing is, indeed, Civilization, but it is only for Export. Is there a difference between the two brands? In some of the details, yes.

We all know that the Business is being ruined. The reason is not far to seek. It is because our Mr. McKinley, and Mr. Chamberlain, and the Kaiser, and the Czar and the French have been exporting the Actual Thing with the outside cover left off. This is bad for the Game. It shows that these new players of it are not sufficiently acquainted with it.—Mark Twain in "To the Person Sitting in Darkness."

VARIOUS VOICES.

J. G. Hunter, Sheridan, Wyo.:—I agree with one of your subscribers, who writes you to stop his paper promptly, at time of expiration of subscription. I do not want to have the use of anything that is not paid for, and if the paper stops, one is apt to look at the number on the last paper. Am happy to say that the ideas for which Mr. Harman has fought so long, are gaining ground—all honor to Prof. Herron.

(Miss) B. R. S., Pa.:—Of course I want everything on these most important subjects. I am a woman, and a teacher, with great influence over my pupils—I teach painting—one of whom is soon to be married. Already I have induced several of them to buy Dr. Foote's "Plain Home Talk." Girls must be enlightened to make the healthy, happy mothers needed. Many of my pupils are now mothers, broken in health, and come to paint with me and be diverted from uncongenial or lustful husbands! So, instead of talking gossip and dresses, in my "private painting classes" I bring up these greater subjects. Enclosed find one dollar for the "Prodigal Daughter," "Hilda's Home," "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs," "New Hedonism." Hoping to receive the above promptly, and with many thanks and commendations for your brave efforts to give us "Light," I remain etc.

J. S. Odegaard, Marcus, Wash.:—Another negro has been burnt. This time in Florida. This thing of burning negroes is getting to be serious. It is not only a national crime but a national disgrace, and seems in great danger of becoming epidemic, if some remedy it not very soon discovered and applied. It is a subject that should concern the whole human race, white as well as black, and should be dealt with as a national affair. The right remedy, if one could be discovered and agreed upon, would perhaps have to be both educational and legislative. Such remedy would no doubt require time, money and patience, as well as personal sacrifice.

But the necessary expenditure ought to be cheerfully met by both races and not the least by the whites; for while the suffering of the blacks are great they are nothing in comparison with the risk the white race is taking—if prenatal science is not a lie—as in the practice of these inhuman cruelties they run a close chance of developing their own into a race of murderers and cutthroats, or perhaps idiots and lunatics, since the act of burning any living being alive unquestionably is more like the work of lunatics than anything else. Whoever has any concern for the welfare of his or her race should not fail to give it thoughtful and careful consideration. As the "Race Question" is daily getting to be more and more of a problem it should be dealt with in a scientific way. Earnestly and hopefully I submit to you these lines for the consideration of the thoughtful public.

X, Y, Z.:—I wantto speak to you about the article by Mr. Lloyd, "Love's Garden," in current Lucifer. He is a mind reader of the first water. It seems to me that it expresses the practice. Better yet would the exact story or experience of people express it. We have too much that is apart from these things. I think it would be hard to find anything better adapted for a leaflet than this thing of Mr. Lloyd's. It is the exact psychology of it, and is to the purpose, and is entertainingly told. What more can you have in one short thing? What we want is life as it IS. We all want the practice. A little while ago I ran across "Chains," running as a serial story in "Discontent." People want to know how these things work. A story that tells it simply takes hold as nothing else does. "Chains" is one of these powerfully simple things. I wrote "Discontent" to ask them to publish it in book form. My feeling was that I wanted some copies. They can't publish it. It is too bad to have to set it up and publish it outright as a book. Why can't you run it as a serial, and stereotype into pages made up right from your columns? I venture that not one of your readers but would be fascinated with the story. I may be wrong, but I judge from its power on me, and some others that I am acquainted with. It may be against your policy to run a serial. I think we should have the policy of doing the most powerful and economic thing. A serial of peculiar power and force might be admitted in short sections. On any week that more timely matter crowded it out, it could go over. But my advice or suggestion should have no weight, except as you see it this way yourself. I am one of the reading public, and of course that goes for what it is worth in helping you decide what is the proper thing to print. What a number of people want very bad is generally a safe thing to print.

[The above opinion is from the editor of one of the leading reform papers in the United States, especially in the line of "Co-operation," economics, collective ownership, etc. M. H.]

MARTYRDOM OF MAN. Winwood Reade. This is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how war and religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for liberty; and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. Winwood Reade's reputation as a writer of fine English, of deep study and careful reasoning, needs no word of praise. Cloth, $1.

MEN, WOMEN, AND GODS. Helen H. Gardener. With preface by Col. R. G. Ingersoll. Contents: Introduction by Col. Ingersoll. Men, Women, and Gods. Vicarious Atonement. RELIGION AND RATIONALISM. The relation of each to human liberty. The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. E. C. Walker. 5c.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Thomas Paine. Answer to Burke's attack upon the French revolution. A political treatise of great general value, as advocating liberty and democracy. Contains the fundamental principles of true republicanism. Cloth, 50c; paper, 25c.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS. Karl Heinzen. A new edition, together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Cloth, $1.

RUBAIYAT (Quatrains) OF OMAR KHAYYAM. Edward FitzGerald's interpretation; with original introduction; special cover; latest version. Paper, 10c.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE. Matilda Joslyn Gage. This is Mrs. Gage's last and crowning work. Every woman ought to read it. Every liberal woman and man will want it. A burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do. Cloth, $1.50; paper, 75c.

WHAT IS RELIGION? Ingersoll's last public address, delivered at the meeting of the Free Religious Association in Boston on June 2, 1899. To which is appended the poem, "Declaration of the Free," the last verse written by the great Freethinker. 5c.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo, 172 pages. 25c.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10c.

Morality, False and True.

BY KARL HEINZEN.

If we measure the sense of shame by the standard of reason, it is justifiable only when it conforms to true morality, and is therefore the expression of the moral consciousness, and in this way we come to understand that the preachers of shame are sometimes the true preachers of immorality, of that immorality which would further morality by the suppression of nature and truth. It is surely not at all necessary to go about naked in order to show that one is free from false shame, nor is it necessary to love each other on the public thoroughfare in order to prove that one recognizes the claims of nature; but only a fool or a hypocrite will want to sacrifice the inner law to external considerations, and incorruptible nature to ridiculous prejudices.

Let us meet the hypocrites with straightforward language.

Is it immoral that the breast of the youth and the maiden is filled with the longing of love? No! Why then do you, priests, demand that they should be ashamed of it, when they have not asked your permission? YOU are the immoral ones.

Is it immoral that a woman should bear a child to her beloved? No! Why do you cast her out, then? You are the immoral ones, the barbarians. You will demand that the trees shall be ashamed to blossom and to bear fruit.

The human being who is ashamed of his nature is not worthy to be a human being. What reasonable ground can you preachers of morality find for shame which you, under the condi ions which you have decreed, connect with sexual love and the act which causes the existence of man? You might with the same right subject eating and drinking to your conditions and expose them to condemnation. If you are ashamed of the sentiment and the act which caused your existence, you ought also to be ashamed of your existence itself, for which you sometimes have sufficient reason.

There is no greater and mo e senseless barbarity than that "moral" passion for condemning which makes the pregnancy of woman a disgrace if nature has not been granted permission by priest or justice of the peace to increase the race. The pregnant woman should under all conditions be "sacred," should stand under the protection and receive the sympathy of the entire community which she is about to increase with an at all events innocent member. Instead of that, it is made out a crime that she has found opportunity, without the aid of the justice of the peace or the priest, to present thecommunity with a new member, and the hatred and persecution of ignorance is incited against the unfortunate one, as if the intention actually were to make a suicide or an infanticide of her. Recently a poor woman hanged herself in Switzerland because she believed herself pregnant and her neighbors shared this belief and made her the target of their respectable vituperations and "moral" persecutions. When the suicide was examined her pregnancy proved to have been only imagined! She died as a victim of nature-disdaining vulgarity, and her murderers were the pious, moralizing clergy. The corpses of unfortunate women which you take from the water, the remains of murdered children which you find in sewers, the bodies of despairing mothers whom you drag to the gallows—these are the witnesses of your pious humanity that builds prisons instead of lying-in hospitals, and that would have hell make foundling-houses superfluous. In Paris foundlings are taken care of as "enfants de la patrie;" in New York, for instance the "enfants de la patrie" are deposited in the gutters of the street. The rich seduce the girls, the priests curse the seduced girls, and the seduced girls murder the sharers of their poverty and the proofs of their imaginary shame. This is in threewords the morality of our present hypocritical society in these matters.

When you have wedded your daughters to rich roues, you welcome their children with joy; if your family is increased by a poor lover, who is not able to "marry," then you heap reproaches on the mother. The reason for the disgrace which you create does not lie therefore in the act to which you try to attach it, but in the single miserable circumstance that you must support the children of your daughters. But if this is the reason of your anger, then why not have the courage to call it by its right name, and do not commit the hypocrisy of expressing a pecuniary consideration in the form of a condemnation of human nature in its most beautiful impulse. You will then reach the conclusion that it is not love that is to blame, but the unnatural conditions which hinder thousands, yes, millions, from living out their natural instincts in a moral relation.

How must a Heloise, who, although surrounded by the piety of the Middle Ages, would rather be the lover than the legal wife of Abelard—how must she appear to you, coarse fellows, who judge love only from the standpoint of priests, and motherhood from that of shopkeepers? She was a great woman, one of the greatest women of history; and you, according to your ideas, you must classify her with the "immoral," because you are not human beings, but priests.

If you want to cultivate shame, then base it upon the strictest ideas of true morality; but do not look for this morality in the domain of your conventional stupidity, your inhuman unnaturalness, and your shameful hypocrisy.

It is not immoral if a man and a woman, even "unmarried," give themselves up to true love; but it is immoral if an old roue marries a young girl whom he knowingly cannot make happy, merely for her physical charms.

It is not immoral if a man and a woman, even "unmarried," give themselves up to true love; but it is immoral if the man merely uses the woman for the satisfaction of his lust, without giving dignity to the relation by real affection or taking his share of the responsibility in the fate of the loving one.

It is not immoral if a woman unites herself with the man whom she loves against the wish of another; but it is immoral if she becomes the wife of a man whom she does not love, because another wishes it.

It is not immoral to get tired of a legal husband upon closer acquaintance and to conceive a new love for another man; but it is immoral to continue, or to be obliged to continue, the old relation notwithstanding this new love.

It is not immoral to consider "chastity" in itself just as much of a stupidity as starvation in itself; but it is immoral to carry "unchastity" to the point of excess.

It is not immoral to persuade a woman to yield herself, but it is immoral to offer her nothing as the prize of her devotion but a feigned love.

In short, it is immoral to disregard the equal rights of the other sex; to abuse it for selfish ends; to falsify or to confuse the ends of nature; to degrade the sexual relation simply to a means for frivolously satisfying the senses or for low speculations; to disfigure the beauty of sexual love by priestly nonsense; to pollute true sentiment by coarse hypocrisy. Be ashamed of these immoralities and you will no longer need any other shame!—From the Rights of Woman and the Sexual Relations.

More About the Press-Writers. No. VI.

BY FRANCIS B. LIVESEY.

SPECIALTIES OF PRESS WRITERS.

James B. Elliott, 3515 Wallace street, Phila., writes: "I read in Lucifer your very interesting article about Press-Writers. There is a great deal of practical information in it. The public press is beginning to treat our liberal correspondence very fairly, taking into consideration that we count, so far as patronage is concerned, a very small part. I am devoting my special attention to replies to the attacks upon Paine and Girard." This Brother then follows with an interesting account of his press experience, all of which would be profitable reading had we a newspaper of our own. It is now in place to send to Brother Elliott anything that appears in the press derogatory to Paine and Girard. E. Livezey defended the latter in the Maryland press a few years ago, and Brother Elliott could have done good service there also had he been known. The next time Recorder Armstrong prints a list of Press-Writers it might be well to append the specialties of each. Then, when a writer saw anything needing answer, he would know to which of his fellow workers it would be most profitable to send clippings.

As new Press-Writers are being constantly added to the list, and as each has one or more hobbies, every possible question can be covered if the writers are only accredited with their specialties.

BOSTON "GLOBE," JEWS AND MISSIONS.

There was a Free Religious Convention in Boston lately. It was participated in by persons of all classes. Ex-Mayor A. A. Perry, of Somerville, Mass., was president. The Boston "Globe" of June 1 gave eight inches of big head lines on its first page to call attention to its proceedings. This paper has lately given religious news in a manner which is to be commended. It lately headed a European dispatch "War on Religion," and stated that the pope was all broken up over the religious situation throughout Europe. I did not see the same in any other paper. Well, the above mentioned convention paid its respects to missions. Among the utterances in condemnation of them were, "Clogs on the Progress of Civilization;" "Blasphemy to try to make all alike in religion;" "Missionary the cause of religious intolerance;" "Cursed be the inventor of missions." This last denunciation was made by Rabbi Joseph Silverman, of New York City. I dropped him a line of praise and told him at the same time that he could go a step further and drop altogether out of the church or synagogue business, which was so intimately related to the missionary business. At the same time I sent him a bunch of circulars calculated to open his eyes to church abolition. The Press-Writers should never fail to follow up such cases as the above privately.

In the same issue of the "Globe," Brother Groh appeared in a long and strong letter, under the caption, "China's Treatment by the Powers." This late war in China, caused by missionaries primarily, has had the effect of making millions lukewarm toward the churches. Jesus covered the ground admirably when He said to the churchmen of His day: "Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made he is ten fold more the child of hell than he was before." Ex-Mayor Perry well said: "Missionaries go to China to Christianize and civilize the people there, yet, when they have made converts, the latter are not allowed to land on America's shores to enjoy the privileges of our civilization." Converted or not converted, upwards of thirty years ago I wrote in the "Boston Investigator" and other papers against closing our doors to the Chinese.

HERE'S FOR A LIVELY REFORM PAPER.

I have heard of many puzzled people, made so by reading "E. M. 301." If Lucifer is to go out in the world on one or more missions, I should say that it should present nothing that unnecessarily adds to people's embarassments. Its sex mission, and its Press-Writers mission—and at present it seems to be the paper destined for it—will give the people enough to think over without any minor details. Among the Press-Writers, page upon page of papers are sent around the country, enclosed in letters at some times and sent with other pages of other papers as third class matter at other times. The big dailies generally have their names, addresses and dates at the head of every page; but papers like Lucifer we are compelled to take in hand and supply the whole three items to. It is a considerable job to those of us who send out many such papers. Then, besides, there is a doubt in the minds of some about putting that much writing on third class matter, and the consequence is such papers too often go out without doing themselves justice. Some of us cut out the names, addresses and dates of papers and paste them on the third class matter with this defect; but in the case of Lucifer we can't even find enough printed matter of this kind to go around. For all of this there is at least a partial remedy and I here submit it to the friends of Lucifer, trusting that a favorable response from them may find Editor Harman ready to make the change. In the first place I would call the paper "Chicago Lucifer," and at the head of every page, as well as at the head of the editorial column would put "Chicago Lucifer, June 1, 1901" or whatever the date might be. It would look like business. Then when the paper is quoted anywhere, the stranger would know exactly where to go to get it, if he wanted it. Sooner or later, as Dr. Wilson says, we must have an official paper. We ought to have it now. We handle every reform subject under the sun. For one, I would very willingly see Lucifer become the official paper. In case it was I would suggest that the name be changed to "The Chicago Reformer," and that larger and more numerous headings be given the various articles. Small as the paper is, it could cover an immense field of reform work if the writers were given to understand that long spun theories were out of place and practical applications to people and things alone were wanted. Take, for instance, the long spun articles of John Peck and Dr. Roberts in the "Truth Seeker." They stand only as a species of intellectual pap fo infants or for old folks in their dotage, both incapaple of doing anything to move the world. With the right kind of articles bristling with news, facts and people, and with some "Honorary members" subscribing to a fund to send out large numbers of copies judiciously, as I can privately direct, Lucifer would soon be made a power far beyond that of all other Liberal papers. To its present courage we want only added business and horse sense. Now, the question is, what do the friends of Lucifer think of these suggestions?

MUST PRESS OUR WANTS.

One of the Club writes: "I don't see the strong point in 2950. Am circulating them, but what is the object?" The point is that the Boston "Post" boasted of being the largest morning paper in New England; that all its growth to date was only a beginning; that its motto was, in part, "Without a Muzzle;" that it was getting in "Another Big Press;" that under the circumstances it was proper to call its attention to a new department by which it might enlarge itself and make itself endeared to the people. J. T. Small, Provincetown, Mass., conceived the idea of getting out the circular. He also paid for it. Practical men of long experience in the business world have endorsed it. It is exactly the right thing. Other editors will be interested in reading it because it refers to one of their contemporaries, and they can also, if they will, take it to themselves. It is always proper to take up every presentation. This was one. "Nothing ventured, nothing won." I wrote the circular and put to it a dozen names of members who had most emphatically voiced for a big paper in which the Press-Writers could appear. The circular went to printer Cullingford by the next mail. I did not care to take a month to secure their approval. I thought if any wanting "free press" could not be willing for the use of their names under the circumstances, they were not worthy of being called members. One did protest; but one of his best friends informs me that he is a man of "moods" and that he must be taken, as I took him, by his general utterances. I should have had the liberty of putting the full one hundred members names to 2950; but I took only those who had emphatically declared along the line.

FREE SPEECH FOR DOWIE.

The Chicago "Flaming Sword" of May 31, gave its leading article in defence of Dowie. It wants free speech and free practice for him, while condemning his religion. Correct! I long since wrote for him in the papers of the Ohio towns in which his followers were mobbed. Another article in the same issue is on the "Abolition of the Reign of Lawyers."

AGNOSTIC MARRIAGE CEREMONY.

It is said that some Freethinker has arranged a form for Agnostic marriage ceremonies. What is the use in imitating the church? Let lovers decide their own form after church and state forms have passed away—as did Prof. Herron.

NEWSPAPER NEW RELIGION.

Hearst's paid writer, Mr. Dam, has given us an article on a "New Religion." Talking about volunteer press-writers, there are about a thousand in the United States that can give a better religion, without money, than Mr. Dam can ever dream of. Yet, according to the "Farmer's Voice," not one of this thousand must be allowed to controvert Mr. Dam.

SOCIALISM AND SCHOOLS.

James Creelman was lately paid by Hearst to write an article against Socialism. Editor J. A. Wayland, of "Appeal to Reason," of Girard, Kansas, answered him at great length in his issue of May 28. So did other socialist editors. They don't give Creelman and Hearst credit for helping along Socialism with might and main. This the latter do in their fight for the Socialistic public schools.

LUCIFER THE BRAVE.

It is interesting to know that Bolton Hall considers Lucifer one of the two most courageous papers he knows of. Alfred Harmsworth, the famous English publisher said American newspapers lacked courage. He told the truth. Let those who appreciate the courageous papers come forth with pen and purse in their defense. Comstock is ever on the watch for them.

PRESS-WRITERS' GOOD AIDS.

Walter Breen, 309 13 street, Omaha, Neb.: Your offer to typewrite for Press-Writers is appreciated. Recorder Armstrong must book you at once. How many duplicates do you give at once? I often want to send half a dozen copies of the same article to different sections of the country, but am prevented by not having a typewriter. We want dozens of young men and women to offer their services as you have done. It is the little things that help mightily.

EMMA NEEDS EDUCATING.

Emma Goldman should be vociferous in praise of the Press-Writers. They come in admirably in her defense wherever necessary. She can generally start an excitement and we can follow it up by cooling the people off into a more respectable recognition of liberty. Some of our oldest and most vigorous writers are strong friends of Emma's, and they should at once duly enlighten her on our work. It is surprising that the editor of "Free Society" should hesitate to endorse us. I sent him an article from Williamsport (Pa.) "Grit" demanding free speech and he printed it. Our idea of organization is harmless. In one sense we are hardly organized at all Most organizations consume all their time electing officers, etc., etc., we have had no time at all for that yet. Every man does exactly what he feels like; no more, no less.

FRIENDS TO PRESS-WRITERS.

I was glad to see that two of Lucifer's oldest friends—Elizabeth H. Russell, of Cleveland, and Henry E. Allen, of Berwick, Illinois, had endorsed the work of the Press-Writers. Brother Allen seems to have a full insight into our work and has been taking hold of some of it himself. Of course, he will have no objection to see Brother Armstrong book him among our most active workers. Elizabeth Russell might also allow herself to be one of us.

THE USE OF $1,000,000.

The Rockland (Mass) "Free Press"—an attractive name—put me on its free list and gives me a chance to answer the clergy and others. It called for responses on what its writers would do with a million dollars. Brother Small appeared in reply on May 31. I appeared on June 4, stating that I would put the bulk in a people's paper—that is the Press-Writers' ideal.

FREEDOM IN LOVE MATTERS.

Margaret Deland, American authoress, says. "In France recent legislation has offered divorce gratuitously; heretofore it was a luxury for the rich." Professor Francis Peabody, in his book—"Jesus Christ and the Social Question," calls for the utmost freedom in all love affairs. People are asking what is to become of the children? I say give us "more love," as Ingersoll lately said, and we will have more regard for the children than we now have. How is it with the Doukhobors? Are their children neglected? Are not their homes and colonies pervaded with love? And yet these same Doukhobors are the only "varietist" sect I know of in civilized society. There are possibilities in freedom which the world has not yet discovered.

Leaflet Literature.

"To Mothers" by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, is a poem which has been greatly admired by many of our readers. We have had it printed as a leaflet and hope that it will be widely circulated.

The paragraphs headed, "Do You Know?" printed in a recent issue make another leaflet worthy of general circulation.

These leaflets contain seed-thoughts which will spring up and bear fruit in thousands of minds and lives.

Will You make yourself a "committee of one" to sow these leaflets broadcast?

Sent for 20 cents a hundred if you can afford to pay for them. If you can't spare the money, tell us how many leaflets you can use, and we will send them to you free.

Lucifer, the Lightbearer.

"A Lively Reform Paper."

From time to time the objection is made that Lucifer is the organ of a specialty; that it does not cover the field of reform; that its editor is narrow, is a "hobbyist," and that if he would make his paper a success, financially or any other way, he must broaden out and take in the whole field of reform—the whole field of human freedom.

While it is true that Lucifer gives its chief attention to rousing the public mind to see the primary and paramount importance of free, self-respecting and self-reliant motherhood, as an element in all needful reforms, it is not true that it has no word for other phases of reform work. The careful reader of our little journal knows better. Not a number goes to press without arguments, hints, suggestions, on other and helpful lines of reform. Prof. Herron's socialistic reform work, the Anarchistic propaganda of Kropotkin, Emma Goldman and others, co-operation in production and distribution, the war question, the various "trusts," hygiene, etc., etc., all these receive a share of our attention, not forgetting the ever-present question of freedom of speech and of press.

Long before most of our critics were heard of as reform workers, Lucifer was battling for the absolute right of each person to live her or his own free, non-invasive life. Lucifer has never failed to stake everything, its life even, upon its support and defence of these principles. Has any paper now in existence, been more faithful to the underlying principles of human freedom and human justice than has Lucifer the Light-Bringer—"Son of the Morning?"

These somewhat personal remarks have been called out by a paragraph in Brother Livesey's talk "About Press-Writers" in this week's Lucifer. With many of his suggestions in regard to the management of Lucifer I am in full accord. With others I fail as yet to see the propriety of the changes indicated. But of this, more later. Meantime I should like to hear briefly expressed opinions from our readers and helpers.

M. H.

Is Lucifer's Work Narrow?

Let us see: When a farmer purposes to raise a crop of corn or potatoes his first and chief solicitude is concerning seed and soil, is it not? Is the farmer a hobbyist? is he narrow and bigoted because of his determination to secure the best possible seed and the best possible soil for his intended crop? On the other hand, would he not be reckoned a foolish farmer if he did not give his first and chief attention to seed and soil?

In the economy of nature motherhood represents both seed and soil in building new human beings. Co-operation of the masculine element—quickening power—is necessary, but of the two, motherhood is incomparably the more important. The old Hindoo proverb that "every mother is worth a thousand fathers," has its basis in truth and nature. This truth is voiced also in the old saying that every great man had a superior mother.

These basic facts in reproduction have their parallel in the work for human freedom on all lines. The first and chief necessity for the reformer is seed and soil. The mind of the hearer and reader is both seed and soil in any reform work. If there is nothing in the mind of the hearer that is ready to respond to the quickening word of the teacher of reform it will be useless to speak or write that word. Nay more; if there is no seed thought in the mind of the hearer, ready to be quickened, the reformer will not only lose his labor but may also lose his life. For lack of this seed thought in suitable soil the hearers may turn upon the teacher and rend him, as has been proved in thousands of cases, and fight for their own oppressors.

Who is it, then, or what is it, that prepares the way for the quickening word of the reformer? WHO BUT THE MOTHERS OF MEN? So long as tha mothers are contented slaves, submissive slaves, in the most important of all human relations,—the conjugal or marital,—so long as women submit to invasion of their persons by men who hold a license to do so from priest or magistrate; so long as woman has neither the courage nor self-respect to demand self-ownership of person and the right to decide whether she will or will not become a mother—just so long will the cure of our economic or other social evils be the unattained and unattainable dream of a few optimistic and sympathetic dreamers.

Col R. G. Ingersoll in the last and greatest speech of his life, struck the keynote of reform when he said that the freedom and self-ownership of mothers is "the solution of the whole matter."

In answer to this last statement we are told that woman cannot be free and self owning under our present economic system. For the thousandth time we reply that woman has NOW THE POWER OF VETO, if she only had the desire, the intelligence and the self-respect to EXERCISE that power.

But very unfortunately for the race of mankind, the vast majority of women are such besotted slaves to "respectability," to religion and to law, that they dare not call their BODIES their own, whatever they may say of their souls. If woman had the courage, the intelligence and the desire to be self-owning, and would say, "no more children till you reform the economic system," our present economic system COULD NOT LIVE A YEAR!

And this is the true and the only way: First the desire, then the courage, then the intelligent understanding of cause and effect, followed by the practical application.

This is why Lucifer, of all other journals now in existence on this planet, is making its first and chief business to rouse in woman and man—especially woman, a sense of the paramount importance of intelligent, self-reliant, self-respecting motherhood, and the necessity on the part of men to respect and honor such motherhood and to prepare economic environments suitable for the practicalization of the best and truest motherhood.

The Right Thing to Do When Married.

BY ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

The New York "Evening Journal" of June 7, 1901, contains this news item:

"Binghamton, June 7.—Robert O. Stanley, who yesterday shot his wife to avoid paying alimony, committed suicide in prison today."

A comparison naturally suggests itself between the generous conduct, the noble heroism and the devoted self-sacrifice of Mr. Stanley and the infamous conduct under similar circumstances of a man whose wickedness has been conspicuously before the public of late,—I mean Professor George D. Herron.

This last named individual, like Mr. Stanley found that the alluring promises with which married life began were not realized in practice as the marital association continued; that the dispositions of himself and wife were not harmonious and that irreconcilable differences developed in the home. Instead, however, of observing the proper and established conventionalities in such case made and provided, as Mr. Stanley did, this pusillanimous Prof. Herron, disregarding all the requirements of civilized society, and openly and wantonly flaunting his depravity in defiance of all respectability, connived with his wife to defraud the public out of a sensation and conspired with her for each to seek harmony and happiness apart from the other.

The inexorable laws of marriage require permanence of the relation "until death," irrespective of the mutual adaptation of the parties as beautifully exemplified in the life and death of Mr. Stanley, and no married couple may hope to defy these laws with impunity. So when this besotted depraved and degraded Prof. Herron sought to tamper with these beneficent laws and to evade them for his own selfish convenience and for his own happiness and the happiness of his wife and children he naturally did the very thing he tried to avoid doing. He brought himself into notoriety at once. What right had he to consider the future happiness of his wife and children? If he had shot them all at once there would not have been so much scandal. But he provided voluntarily for his wife and for his children in a way satisfactory to his wife instead of compelling her to seek alimony as Mr. Stanley did, and then having made the provision he ignominiously fulfilled it instead of following the exalted example of Mr. Stanley who commendably withheld alimony.

Wife-beating, shooting, suicide, anything in fact, is more readily condoned by society than the immoralities practised by Prof. Herron in his separation from his wife. So we see that Mr. Stanley's orderly and regular conduct attracts no adverse criticism whatever, while the whole press of the country breaks out in a spasm of virtuous indignation condemnatory of the iniquities of Prof. Herron and his wife who rashly undertake to regulate their own lives and settle their own differences without the sanction of their neighbors.

And that is not the worst of it. Prof. Herron instead of shooting his wife, as he should, not only tries to make her comfortable contrary to established usage, but unites himself to another woman without paying the proper fees therefor. This was the greatest crime of all, and to intensify the heinousness of it all Prof. Herron was educated as a preacher and knows how all-important is the matter of fees in such cases.

Contrasting the conduct of these two men our heartiest approval must go forth to Mr. Stanley who at great cost to himself maintained in their fullest integrity the binding forces of the sacred institution of marriage in a way which must be approved by all religious people, while Prof. Herron's sneaking effort to adjust his own affairs in his own way appropriately receives the condemnation of such holy men as Brother Hillis.

SUGGESTIVE AND SELF-EXPLANATORY.

A Private Agreement of Freedom Between Central Lovers About to Adopt Legal Marriage.

BY J. WM. LLOYD.

We the undersigned, believing that human hearts and lives should be free, but being about to adopt legal marriage as a shield against the barbarous and merciless persecution and ostracism visited upon lovers who ignore it, do herewith give each other mutual pledges of freedom and justice as follows, to wit:

We declare each the other to be as absolutely free after this ceremony as before in body, mind and will, and in the matter of loving and being loved by any human being whatever.

We mutually absolve and set each other free from all the legal promises, obligations, powers, "rights" or privileges given, taken, or received in the act and process of legal marriage. Because we perfectly love and trust each other (otherwise neither of us would have dared risk legal marriage with its possibilities of slavery) and expect and hope to be loving and loyal help-mates, friends, comrades and companions till death, we do not feel that we thereby acquire any right to command or demand anything from each other, or to interfere in any way with each other's freedom, or to hold each other in this union one moment longer than our mutual love, trust and attraction continue.

Love and love only is our uniting magnet. We promise to respect each other's privacy in letters, rooms, person and in any and every desired matter and manner.

We promise to be generous, just and kind to each other's lovers, friends and comrades, so far as this may be possible, feeling every love for our loved one a magnet of sympathy and deserving gratitude, rather than just cause for jealousy.

We promise to respect each other's confidences and to keep each other's secrets against the world.

We agree to be loyal and helpful to each other in sorrow, sickness, helplessness and trouble.

We mutually agree to a separate and understood possession of property and individual earnings, precisely as if we were not married. Or if we adopt any form or degree of formal communism that shall be as we mutually agree, with the right of either to withdraw at any time always understood.

If for any reason either desires to separate from this marital union the other promises not only not to oppose any legal or physical force or over persuasion, but, if the resolve is thoughtfully and deliberately taken and fixed, promises to generously and kindly aid in dissolving all legal or other bonds which might impede the separation or the formation of any other or more desired union.

If there are children it is mutually agreed that so long as the mother lives they shall be considered peculiarly hers and she shall have the casting vote in all differences of opinion as to their management. And should another lover be the father of her child the man in this contract agrees to acknowledge it as his own, so that both the mother and child may be shielded from the barbarous reproach of the world.

We mutually agree to equally share the cost of each child's support (which if one dies the other will altogether assume) and this to continue even if we separate.

And if there is any other freedom or justice or kindness which we have forgotten to specify we hereby confirm it by mutual promises to each other, for this is not an agreement to be kept as a form, or in the letter, but in the spirit and with a loving and generous good will; for freedom, justice and generosity we regard as the only sure foundations of enduring love.

And knowing well that this agreement has no legal force, and desiring that it should have none, we mutually bind it on our conscience and our honor. Signed—JOHN DOE, JANE ROE.

Why Should Love Die?

BY BELLE C.

"Let me not to the marriage of true minds
Admit impediments. Love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove;
O no! it is an ever fixed mark,
That looks on tempests, and is never shaken!
It is the star to every wandering bark,
Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.
Love's not time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
Within his bending sickle's compass come;
Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
But bears it out even to the edge of doom.
If this be error, and upon me prov'd,
I never writ, nor no man ever lov'd."

—Shakespere.

"Serene I hold my hands and wait
Nor care for wind, nor tide, nor sea
I rave no more 'gainst time nor fate
For lo! mine own shall come to me."

Love is a fact. When the sun shines warm on our back—we may have our eyes closed, but nevertheless we know the sun shines. We may step in the shadow—the clouds may come 'twixt us and the sun—still we are sure the sun shines, somewhere.

Who does not observe the rays of the sun coming through a small aperture. It appears like something one can grasp. I have seen a child try to do so. Once in receiving a telepathic message I seemed to be in such a ray—within that bright space I seemed to be and the space was filled with love vibrations. It did not seem to be a voice—but rather a fact—a state of being.

Who has not looked into a kaleidescope and seen the ever changing figures and wondered how it was so regular and beautiful, then to dissect it and find the bits of colored glass that formed the basis of the symmetrical and beautiful figures.

It seems to me, we, each and every one of us, stand in the same relation each to the other as the bits of glass. To make a harmonious whole there must ever be changes. The loves we need today, will not develop our needs ten years hence.

The flower should not cling to the stalk after the petals fall, but be satisfied to see them on the ground and underfoot knowing it must be so in order to give proper nourishment for the fruit and seed.

We are simply a part of a stupendous whole—our vision measures only a part and not the whole.

For us each to fulfill our mission whatever it may be to the best of our ability—is, I am sure all, that will be expected of us.

I have a little German friend; she was a great comfort and pleasure to me when she was a romping school girl many years ago, with her sunny eyes and golden curls. We do not meet often now—but when with her I always feel, "Laura I love you so."

BY C. F. H.

Certain Christian Scientists claim that Mrs. McKinley was brought back to life by "absent treatment" even while regular physicians were laboring constantly with her. Other "scientists" say this is impossible unless the patient desired and asked for the treatment. Is voodooism on the increase? If there be logic among these self-deluded people let them grapple with the two horns of the dilemma: If these cures are according to natural law, there should be no failures. If they be due to interference with natural law by a power above that law, then we have the spectacle of a whimsical, fickle god who cures some, neglects others who need cures more, according to the state of mind of the patient, or other foolish reason. A human parent who should fail to help his child in accident or sickness, regardless of the gratitude or faith of the child, would be thought a monster.

The theory that a protective tariff keeps both money and goods in the country which produces them, has received a hard blow, dealt by Mr. Carnegie who has given $10,000,000 to colleges in Scotland. This money will now employ Scotchmen, teachers and others, instead of Americans. The fact that Germany and other nations are contemplating the exclusion of cheap American manufactured goods, is another fact that should teach Americans how false and ridiculous is "protection." Obviously the only way to protect American labor is to place a tariff on what the laborer has to sell, i. e. labor; in other words a tax on immigration. This has never been done or proposed.

"Senator H. W. Smith, of Oregon, suggests that the Christian nations appropriate to the support of the starving heathen Chinese the indemnity demanded of that nation. He thinks that such a national charity would give the nations a real Christian character among the Chinese, and would be acceptable in the sight of the Christian's God. The suggestion is a good one, but it is not likely that nations which would demand the amount that the Christian nations are demanding would give it away."

What Workingmen Want.

Workingmen of the world, what are your wants? What do you desire? What are you claiming for yourselves? In these days of social progress and awakening there is no question for you to think of that is comparable to that. More than you think depends on how you answer that question. And the gravest danger is, not that your wants will be too large, but that they will be too small. Whether you are to inaugurate a new era in human history, nobler and more beneficent than any or all that have gone, or make shipwreck of human hope and lose the rich heritage of ages, depends upon the largeness, the scope, the earnestness of these wants of yours.

One great difficulty with our labor movement is that it is saturated with the spirit of hypocrisy which many of us supposed was confined to the church. The world takes the hypocrisy of the church for granted. It is a universal instinct to discount religion. No one takes any religious claim seriously. But we have to learn that the same hypocrisy has completely saturated the labor movement. We workingmen are all saying what we do not mean. We are lying to each other. Our whole profession is a lie. The religious man says he believes in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. But all his fellows know that he believes nothing of the kind. Practically he does not believe in any God at all. He acts strictly upon the assumption that there is no God. And the brotherhood of man is a transparent fraud on the lips of religious people. I speak as a member of the religious institution.

A large number of workingmen have been alienated from the church. They declare the whole thing a fake. And yet thousands of these men are trying to perpetrate a like fraud on the world. They are making claims that are evidently insincere. What is it that workingmen want, or say they want? Thousands of them will answer as they did in the last political campaign: "We want a job. We want a chance to work for some one. We want some one to employ us. We want to be wage slaves." And organized labor is saying: "We want an eight-hour day. We want a few more cents a day added to our wages." If we workingmen were really honest we should make no such claims or demands. For these things do not express our real wants. It is not a "job" that any man really wants. Neither is it the chance to be a wage slave. Nor is it an eight hour day. What is it that we really want? We want the satisfaction of our desires. That sums the whole thing. First, we want certain material things. We want enough to eat. We want the best. The best is none too good for us. We want wholesome food, a good variety, and plenty of it.—"The Worker," New York.

She nearly had a fit,
You see, he was her husband
And she wasn't used to it.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Reinhold Starcke, Beaver Falls, Pa.:—"Karezza" is worth its weight in diamonds; no, I cannot put any value on it, it is simply so valuable that its value cannot be stated in words. Please send two copies each "Zugazent's Discovery" and "The Strike of a Sex," for which I enclose one dollar, twenty-five cents each.

J. H. Steffer, Macon, Ga.:—Enclosed find twenty cents for which send sample copies of No. 869 to the enclosed names, with the article "Sexual Starvation" marked with blue pencil, and send five copies of same to me.

[We still have a supply of the number containing this much appreciated article which we will send to all applicants for two cents per copy.]

E. C. H., Oberlin, Ohio:—My subscription to Lucifer expired two weeks ago. Thanks for sending them. I would not like to lose one copy of the bright little paper. I wish I could send you a long list of names, but I cannot, people seem to be afraid to think on the line of Lucifer's work. Please find inclosed $2, one for Lucifer another year. For the remainder send me "Leaflet Literature," which I will try to scatter where they will do the most good; E. C. Walker's "Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses;" "Health Hints," by Dr. Foote, and the "Sanctity of Marriage," by Dr. Greer.

Sergt. Arthur Gilman, 11th. Hussars, Cairo, Egypt:—I have received the two copies of Lucifer and am very pleased with them. Have been looking out for something that way for a considerable time but could not find it. I cannot afford to be continually buying one dollar books and it seems a bit hard to one who sees the necessity for sexual reform but is debarred from knowing what progress is being made by those who are fighting for it. So I am sending a year's subscription together with price of books as below: Lucifer one year, $1.; New Hedonism, 5c; What the Young Need to know, 10c; Bar Sinister, etc., 25c; Personal Rights, etc., 20c; Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses, 15c; Sexual Enslavement of Women, 5c; Love in Freedom, 5c; What is Religion, 10c; Evolution of Modesty, 5c. I add 25cts, for any like literature.

In Canada some years ago a married woman became enamoured of an unmarried man and they eloped. This was an unwise thing for them to do, since a few weeks apart would doubtless have turned their infatuation into indifference, thus reaching the same state with less trouble. The home should not be lightly exchanged for railroad trains and hotels. Nevertheless I suppose more misery results from women wanting to run off with another man and not doing it than from following their inclination. Whichever course they take they are likely to regret it. The husband in such cases has the right to retaliate. He should avenge himself condignly upon his recreant spouse by taking another. In the Canadian case he went after the fleeing couple and killed the man. A jury acquitted him of murder. A Canadian paper when, it appears to me, misses the point of the incident, has no censure for the murderer, but declares that "it seems high time that the Canadian legistature enacts legislation providing for the punishment of adultery as a crime." Is not an adulterer punished when he is killed?—Geo. E. Macdonald.

The same philosophy in this matter is to let every soldier of progress do what he can, following the law of his own temperament, and recognizing the same right and duty on the part of others. It is folly for one temperament to quarrel with another for being different. The bolder are somewhat apt to despise the less bold as cowardly, but that is usually a mistake. On the other hand, the less bold are still more apt to sneer at the bolder as vulgar and forward, which is usually a greater mistake.—George W. Foote.

I am the man, I suffered, I was there.
The disdain and calmness of martyrs,
The mother of old, condemned for a witch, burnt with dry wood, her children gazing on;
The hounded slave that flags in the race, leans by the fence, blowing, covered with sweat;
The twinges that sting like needles his legs and neck, the murderous buckshot and the bullets—
All these I felt or am. —Walt Whitman.

There's many a trouble
Would break like a bubble
And into the waters of Lethe depart
Did we not rehearse it
And tenderly nurse it
And give it a permanent place in the heart.
—G. Clark.

THE HOME CYCLOPEDIA

OF POPULAR MEDICAL, SOCIAL, AND SEXUAL SCIENCE.

Contains a full, plain, and easy reading treatise on "Health and Disease, with Recipes," all the average reader can profitably learn of personal hygiene and common diseases (including special, separate chapters for men and women); all right up to date, and fully illustrated with hundreds of photo-engravings and chromo-lithographs. Contains also the already popular "Plain Home Talk" about the relations of the sexes and social customs in all ages and all countries, with "original and startling" suggestions for social reforms; newly revised, enlarged, and well illustrated. All is "heart to heart" plain home talk from a clear-thinking, plain-speaking, liberal minded medical author of over forty years experience. Nearly 1,000,000 of his former books sold. A curious book for curious people, and a sensible book for every one. Answers 1,000 delicate questions one would like to ask his regular physician and yet doesn't want to.

1,265 pages, 400 illustrations, (82 in colors), 700 recipes. Price, Cloth bound, $2, mailed. Address Lucifer Office, 500 Fulton St. Chicago.

Wanted: Addresses of ladies, free in all that the word implies, especially from religion and mother grundy, that will correspond with gentlemen likewise free. No fee. A PHYSICIAN IN THE HOUSE. A New Family Medical Work, by Dr. J. H. Greer. This book is up-to-date in every particular. It will save you hundreds of dollars in doctors' bills. It tells you how to cure yourself by simple and harmless home remedies. It recommends no poisonous or dangerous drugs. It teaches how to save health and life by safe methods. It teaches prevention—that it is better to know how to live and avoid disease than to take any medicine as a cure. It is not an advertisement and has no medicine to sell. It has hundreds of excellent recipes for the cure of the various diseases. It has 16 colored plates showing different parts of the human body. The chapter on Painless Midwifery is worth its weight in gold to women. The "Care of Children" is something every mother ought to read. It teaches the value of Air, Sunshine, and Water as medicines. It contains valuable information for the married. This book cannot fail to please you. If you are looking for health by the safest and easiest means, do not delay getting it. It has eight hundred pages, is neatly bound in cloth, with gold letters, and will be sent by mail or express, prepaid to any address, for $2.75.

MARRIAGE. Dr. Juliet H. Severance. 5c.

MARRIAGE AND MORALITY. Lillian Harman. 5c.

MARTYRDOM OF MAN. Winwood Reade. This is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how war and religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for liberty; and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. Winwood Reade's reputation as a writer of fine English, of deep study and careful reasoning, needs no word of praise. Cloth, $1.

MEN, WOMEN, AND GODS. Helen H. Gardener. With preface by Col. R. G. Ingersoll. Contents: Introduction by Col. Ingersoll. Men, Women, and Gods. Vicarious Atonement. Historical Facts and Theological Fictions. Appendix. Address to the Clergy and Others. Letter to Cleveland Congress of Freethinkers. The only authorized and correct edition. Large 12mo, heavy-toned paper. Portrait. This volume is by far the best writing this famous author ever did. It is very fine. Cloth, $1; paper, 50c.

MISSING LINK IN MODERN SPIRITUALISM, THE. A. Leah (Fox) Underhill. With portraits of the Fox Sisters and others. 478 pages. Cloth. Reduced to $1.

MORIBUND SOCIETY AND ANARCHY. Jean Grave. Cloth, 60c; paper, 25c.

MOTHERHOOD IN FREEDOM. M. Harman. 5c.

MUTUAL BANKING. A simple plan to abolish interest on money. William B. Greene. 10c.

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL GUESSES. E. C. Walker. Contents: Love and Law; The Moloch of the Monogamic Ideal; The Continuity of Race-Life, and Tyranny; Food and Sex Fallacies, a Criticism; When Men and Women Are and When They Are Not Varietists; The New Woman: What is she? What will she be? The State Hiding Behind Its Own Mistakes; Bishop Potter's Opinion of Divorce; Love: Its Attraction and Expression; Is She an Honest Girl? Lloyd, Platt, and the Pitiful Facts; Social Radicals and Parentage; Anthropology and Monogamy; Love and Trust Versus Fear; Reflections upon Reading William Platt's "Women, Love, and Life."

PERSONAL RIGHTS AND SEXUAL WRONGS. Oswald Dawson. 20c.

REGENERATION OF SOCIETY. Lillian Harman. 5c.

RELIGION AND RATIONALISM. The relation of each to human liberty. The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. E. C. Walker. 5c.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Thomas Paine. Answer to Burke's attack upon the French revolution. A political treatise of great general value, as advocating liberty and democracy. Contains the fundamental principles of true republicanism. Cloth, 50c; paper, 25c.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS. Karl Heinzen. A new edition, together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. A book of 335 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Cloth, $1.

RUBAIYAT (Quatrains) OF OMAR KHAYYAM. Edward FitzGerald's interpretation; with original introduction; special cover; latest version. Paper, 10c.

RULED BY THE TOMB. A discussion of free thought and free love. Orford Northcote. 10c.

SONGS OF THE UNBLIND CUPID. J. Wm. Lloyd. Edition de luxe. Verses printed from Kelmscott type upon deckle edged hand made paper of cerulean tint. Initial letters, ornaments and borders are in red; initial letter and sketch upon the opening page are hand painted in water colors. Covers brown, with choice of silver or gold lettering. Very handsome gift book. 30c.

THE WOMAN WHO DID. Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

THE BAR SINISTER AND LICIT LOVE, including the first biennial proceedings of the Legitimation League, and a full account of the Lanchester case, with full-page half-tone pictures of Edith Lanchester, and Lillian Harman. Handsomely bound in green and gold covers. 307 pages. 25c.

THE BRITISH BARBARIANS. Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth. 281 pages. $1.

THE REVIVAL OF PURITANISM. E. C. Walker. 10c.

TALKS ON NATURE. Important information for both sexes. Dr. J. H. Greer. 192 pages. Reduced from 50 to 25c.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says: 'Be happy and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and ascetism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 20 large pages; twelve copies, 50c. Single copy, 5c.

THE WORM TURNS. Revolutionary Poems. Voltairine de Cleyre. 10c.

THE COMING WOMAN. Lillie D. White. 5c.

THE CHICAGO MARTYRS. The famous speeches of the eight condemned anarchists in Judge Gary's Court, and Altgeld's reasons for pardoning Fielden, Neebe and Schwab. 25c.

TRAVELS IN FAITH. By Capt. Robert C. Adams. His mental experience from superstition to rationalism. Cloth, 75c; paper, 25c.

THE SANCTITY OF MARRIAGE. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution, its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25c to 10c.

VINDICATION OF THOMAS PAINE. Col. R. G. Ingersoll. Dealing with all the slanders brought against the name and fame of Paine. A little pamphlet which every admirer of Thomas Paine should have by him for reference. Paper, 15c.

VITAL FORCE. Magnetic Exchange and Magnetation. Albert Chavannes. 25c.

WHY THE UNDERTONE? An open letter to Judge Gary. Sarah E. Ames. 10c.

WHEN LOVE IS LIBERTY AND NATURE LAW. John Badcock, Jr. 10c.

WHAT IS PROPERTY? An Inquiry into the Principle of Right and of Government. P. J. Proudhon. Translated by B. R. Tucker. 500 pages. Cloth. (Slightly shelf-worn.) Reduced to $1.

WHEN IS FREEDOM FREE OR EQUALITY EQUAL In the Social Evil or in Marriage? Orr W. Lee. 10c.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE. Matilda Joslyn Gage. This is Mrs. Gage's last and crowning work. Every woman ought to read it. Every liberal woman and man will want it. A burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do. Cloth, $1.50; paper, 75c.

WHAT IS RELIGION? Ingersoll's last public address, delivered at the meeting of the Free Religious Association in Boston on June 2, 1899. To which is appended the poem, "Declaration of the Free," the last verse written by the great Freethinker. 5c.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo. 172 pages. 25c.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10c.

TYRANTS.

It was all so simple in the old days, when people saw, or thought they saw, tyranny and oppression centered in one person, and in attacking and destroying that person were sure that they were saving mankind.

How easy it is to treat a boil just as a boil and to forget the corrupt blood that produced it, running into every nook and cranny of the body!

To-day, alas, the tyrant spreads like a vicious kind of nervous system throughout the entire frame of society.

I am part tyrant, part slave, as we all are in varying degree, and there seems to be no other alternative possible.

We are caught in the meshes of our own web.

We must disentangle the tyrant from us, and this new Gordian knot will not yield its secret to the sword.

We must thresh the chaff from the corn, and each grain has its separate outworn casing waiting to be winnowed away.

Alas, it is no simple rebellion on the old lines that calls for our adhesion and support;

It is rather a complicated labor of unraveling and extricating and liberating from the network of poisonous creepers of the ages, whose roots are in our own hearts.

Heredity and Prenatal Influence.

BY J. H. GREER, M. D.

For the upbuilding of character there is nothing to compare with the power of the human will. Every obstacle can be overcome by its strength, if other mental propensities were not cultivated at its expense. As yet the advancement of the world has left the will a puny, sickly, undeveloped thing, for which hundreds of make-shifts are necessary in its place.

Outside of the human will are the three great moulds of character, heredity, (which, in its ordinary meaning includes pre-natal influence), environment, and education.

Heredity is the foundation of the character. It is that law which does not allow grapes to grow off thorns, nor figs off thistles, nor apples from peach trees. What is received by heredity is the harvest of seeds sown by ancestors. Webster defines it as being "the biological law by which living beings tend to repeat their characteristics in their descendants. Sidney Barrington Elliott, M. D., distinguishes heredity from pre-natal influence, as follows: Heredity is that law by which permanent and settled qualities of the parents or the more remote ancestors re-appear in the child; while pre-natal influence signifies the effect produced upon the future being by temporary conditions of the parents, as by temporary mental states, (anger, fear, happiness), or by temporary physical conditions, (activity, health, exhaustion of a part or of the entire body).

Tendencies to organic diseases, or such diseases as consumption and scrofula come through heredity. And vices, such as the liquor and tobacco habits, or sexual depravity, are handed through generations unless throttled by strength of will on the part of some descendant. What is true of vices is also true of virtues. They can be handed down "unto the third and fourth generation," and farther.

Eminent authorities are agreed, however, that conditions influencing a pregnant woman make an indelible impress on the character of her child, modifying, and even changing hereditary tendencies.

It is rather too sweeping an assertion to say a mother has within herself the power to bring forth just such a child as she wishes, because not one woman in a thousand has the conditions she wishes for her own physical and mental comfort. The most intimate relation conceivable is that of mother and unborn babe. Each breath she inhales, the food she eats, the emotions she feels, have an immediate effect upon the child.

The direct influence of the father is received at the time of conception. Not only the hereditary, or permanent characteristics, but also the condition of his mind and body at that time are transmitted. After that his reflection will come through the mother. All other things being equal for the good of the coming child, it still remains that a healthy germ must come from a strong, clean, upright father before offspring can be such as desired. Man is willing to place the whole responsibility of child-breeding and child-rearing on woman, and if she is successful he approves of "his" children. If otherwise, he wonders why "her" children are not as he wished to see them. There is a crying need of wisdom in both parents, but particularly is there a need of men, pure, natural, and unperverted, for fathers.

The present system of civllization is greatly responsible for the kind of citizens it has. It has come to be necessary for the majority of people, men and women and children, to toil to the last notch of endurance in order to exist. They have no time to cultivate the pure and beautiful and good. They are denied all that makes life worth living. Music, art, books have no place in the majority of lives, to civilization's great shame be it said. Only the sensuous enjoyment of their own bodies is within reach of the toiling thousands, and that in the coarsest manner, because they do not conceive of purity. With no lightening of the burden of existence, and without the ability to understand knowledge of themselves, where does the hope of a better day shine in?

unfolding baby life. Somewhere there is a cause why this condition does not surround every prospective mother, and it should be the duty of every person who has time to think, to look for the cause with the object of removing it. Mrs. Waisbrooker in "A Sex Revolution" very truly states that "garrets, cellars, bare walls, coarse food and clothing are not likely to furnish a high order of offspring." The plan operating at the present time punishes, kills and imprisons children of its own creation, when it would be far less expensive for the mother State to remove the causes, for criminality, insanity, etc., by carefully providing good conditions for her unborn population. Almshouses, jails, and reformatories are monuments to prevalent selfishness and ignorance.

The influence of the mother over the character of the unborn child is often referred to in the case of Napoleon I. Previous to his birth the mother accompanied her husband in expeditions of warfare. She not only became familiar with all the horrors and details of war, but enjoyed it, and herself helped to plan. She was on horseback in the open air most of the time, and acquired perfect physical health. The babe at that time developing afterwards astounded the world with his genius for warfare.

The life of Dante was moulded by the effect a vision had upon the mind of his mother, which is described in the language of Dr. Davis as follows: "During the important period immediately preceding the birth of Dante, his mother saw a startling vision of grandeur and great depth of significance. She beheld a populated globe of symmetrical proportions rise gradually out of the sea and float in midheavens. It was decorated with every conceivable element of natural and artificial beauty. Upon a high and grand mountain, which melted away in the distant horizon and sloped gracefully into lands and lakes that spread out to the left, stood a man with a brilliant countenance whom she knew to be her son. She beheld a precipice of abrupt ascent, like the walls of an immeasurable gulf with depth unknown. Thereupon she thought she fainted with excess of fright. But the son was as serene as the morning star; and looking again she saw no evil. After this thrilling and beautiful vision Dante's mother had only in view the greatness of her unborn child—whose genius as a scholar and poet, as a creator of fancies, is known throughout all lands of civilization."

The mother of Burns gave to him a happy disposition, and a genius for putting into rhyme the legends and every day life of the Scotch by the even tenor of her life before his birth. It is said "It was her frequent pleasure to give wings to the weary hours by chanting old songs and ballads of which she had a large store."

Lord Byron attributed his cross ill-grained temper to pre-natal conditions.

The case of James I. of England is another instance. David Rizzio to whom Mary, Queen of Scots, was much attached was killed by the sword in her presence a short time before the birth of her son. The sight of a sword terrorized James I, so much so, that, in conferring the degree of Knighthood where it is necessary to lay a sword upon the shoulders of the candidate, he would turn his head away, often endangering the sight or facial appearance of the candidate thereby.

There are hundreds of instances in every day life to prove what is no longer a theory regarding pre-natal influence. A mother's energy, industry, cheerfulness or virtue takes hold of her unborn child, and just as surely on the other hand, will selfishness, irritability or weakness make their impress.—From "Talks on Nature."

More About the Press-Writers. No. VII.

BY FRANCIS B. LIVESEY.

A SPECIALIST ON CRIMINALS.

Press-Writer J. C. Bell, Box 297, Cleveland, Ohio, is a socialist on matters pertaining to criminals. He has some very practical ideas along his line and if he would watch the press he would find many opportunities to expatiate. It is impossible for me to enter fully into the work of every writer or to assist it with dimes or dollars, yet I am always ready to point the path that leads to expression through the press.

LO, THE GOOD "INFIDEL."

Press-Writer V. A. Corder, Stoutsville, Ohio, is a Christian, yet he says the "Infidels" are nearer the kingdom of heaven than the churchmen. Some reports seem to indicate that he has been treated harshly by the orthodox; if so, he or his friends have but to give full particulars to the Press-Writers upon the next offense of this kind and we will see if he cannot be allowed both free speech and free action in matters that result in no injury to others. Brother Corder, like myself, wants schools, churches and a few other things abolished.

SOCIALISTS AND THEIR DIVIDE.

"How long, O Lord, how long will it take you, friend Livesey, to get the idea out of your head that Socialists want to divide up? Things are divided up now, and that is what Socialists object to." Thus writes W. S. Boyd, of Redding, Cal., in reply to a paragraph in my circular 2395. Bolton Hall and others have done the same. I am well aware that many Socialists are thoroughly opposed to any "divy," yet as there are just fifty-seven different varieties of Socialism, and as I have often met with the "divy" variety in cold type, I have taken the priviledge to enlarge upon it. To me, anything that divides up my liberty would divide up all else that I have also.

NEW IDEA FOR PRESS WRITERS.

I had about two dozen subjects that I wanted to express myself for and against in the "Boston Traveler." The paper was piled up with letters from me waiting publication. Subjects would get flat by delay, so I thought to classify the subjects and give the people an idea of what I hated and what I liked in two short letters. I headed one of these letters "Some Incorrect Things," which appeared May 23. The other, headed, "Some Correct Things," appeared June 3. There was an amusing mistake in this latter letter. One sentence should read:

"The rebuff that the working people of New Castle, Pa., gave to a proposition for the establishment of a Carnegie library." Any of the Press-Writers who want people to know in a nutshell just what they want and what they don't want, could do well to try this "Incorrect" and "Correct" plan.

GOT AWAY FROM CHURCHES.

Tolstoy, Rusby, Herron! Next! Yes, we want to form a class of all the men and women who have been or are expelled from the churches. At this writing, news just comes that Prof. Herron has been expelled and "is no longer a Congregationalist." A dispatch from Grinnell, Ia., to the Baltimore "Sun," reads, in part: "He stated that he was called on a divine mission, as a sort of new prophet, and that his wife did not give him her sympathy and appreciation, so that the home atmosphere was uncongenial. He and his wife discussed the question many times, he says, and finally agreed to separate." Thus it is, we see, that Prof. Herron follows the example of Napoleon and the precepts of Jesus. If there are any Congregationalists who do not say "Amen!" to the verdict of the church court, let them stand up. "Liberty is our word and message," says Dr. William Hayes Ward, editor of the New York "Independent"—what does he say on the subject?

TOLSTOY! CROSBY! LIBERTY!

The June "Pilgrim," published at Battle Creek, Mich., has an interesting article on Tolstoy, by Ernest H. Crosby, of Rhinebeck, New York. Mr. Crosby says he would be glad if Tolstoy was banished and found himself compelled to come to England and America to deliver some "wholesome" messages to the people swamped in "selfish aggrandizement." Let not Ernest be too fast on this point. It was he and others that stimulated the coming to America of the Doukhobors. They are now in a fix. So far as I see neither Ernest nor any of the other enthusiasts are properly defending them. I hope I do not see far enough and that Ernest and the others are working for the liberty of the good people. It would be most mortifying to see Tolstoy come and get set upon by preachers and goody goody people, as has Emma Goldman, Prof. Herron and others, and with few of his admirers flying to the secular press in his defense. Tolstoy might even be arrested by local authorities or by Comstock agents before he was through. Of course, we have a fashion of calling this "the land of the free," but when some of the best of us seek to enjoy that freedom in the high and holy ways peculiar to either science or religion, we find that there is a mistake somewhere. Tolstoy's mere presence in this country would shake it as by an earthquake. It is said he cannot be exiled, however. Considering Tolstoy the greatest man of the age, I have a little boy to whom I have given his full name. 100,000 copies of Jane "Pilgrim" went out.

BRYAN NOT FOR THE PRESS-WRITERS.

Brother Groh wrote editor Bryan, of Lincoln, Neb., that he ought to open his paper to Press-writers. William J. gave him a long, conventional, evasive reply. "The Commoner" possesses the remarkable distinction of being a paper entirely shut to the people's voice. The common people, and even the uncommon, for that matter, have never been seen in its columns. What's for their good Mr. Bryan will give them without their assistance. They have not been sufficiently educated to express themselves in cold type. They are likely to disgrace themselves, the Democracy and their country if they are allowed to disport themselves where only he of the editorial sanctum should be allowed to sway the sceptre. I could have told Brother Groh that it was useless to write editor Bryan. Before his paper saw the light I gave him all the points necessary for making his paper a paper of the common people. I also wrote many articles favoring his election. I was about the first man he booked as a subscriber. But I am not in it now, and neither can I find a single man that is. I have sent my "Commoner" to friends ar and near—good Democrats some of them. From all came the cry "Enough!" No matter how much a man is in love with any social, religious or political theory, when he comes to pick up a paper he feels an indescribable inclination to see something more than one theory represented. It is the infinite variety that makes the big daily so attractive. There is enough in the reform world to give a large variety to any reform paper. It is this variety that I want to see some reform paper allow. But don't let any of us waste any more time trying to draw press blood out of such turnips as William Jennings of "The Commoner," or Charles C. of "The Blue Grass Blade." They are fixed in their orbits, let them alone.

INHOSPITALITY AMONG ANARCHISTS.

Reformers sometimes estrange people by uncalled-for harshness. I saw a sample of this in "Discontent" recently and another in "Free Society." The big "Pennsylvania Grit," of Williamsport, that goes out to over 100,000 subscribers has a department edited by "Topique." After the attempt of the Philadelphia authorities to suppress Emma Goldman's free speech, "Topique" came out in strong advocacy of free speech for Anarchists and all others. It was such a good article that I deemed it worthy of republication in Chicago "Free Society," to which paper I quickly sent it. It was duly published, but accompanying it was a foot note harshly claiming that "Topique" didn't know anything about Anarchism. In "Grit" of June 16, "Topique" answers this at some length and puts me in full sympathy with him; he says, in part: "I made no attempt to discuss Anarchism; I merely made a plea for the right of Anarchists to discuss their views publicly, because freedom of speech is both a right and a social safeguard." Very different was the reception Brother Small gave me when I was a doubter of Anarchy. If he had made the mistake that "Free Society" made in this case, there might have been one less man in sympathy with Anarchists at the present time. Let reformers be more hospitable. The experienced Press-Writer, in addition to sending clippings to his fellows, can popularize himself with editors and greatly assist in the dissemination of stirring matter by sending clippings to papers that they concern.

Sykesville, Md.

Importance of the Press-Writers' Work.

The following paragraphs are from the pen of D. Webster Groh, of Hagerstown, Md., and are being circulated as a leaflet:

"Intelligent editors well know that, in a free, fair, and full discussion, error alone can lose and truth must eventually win. While articles written for pay are tempered to suit the whims and prejudices of editors and readers, those from unpaid correspondents are inspired by the philanthropic motive of correcting error and enlightening mankind.

"They are the outpourings of deep-seated conviction, from thinkers who are not afraid to spead the truths they have discovered, no matter how distasteful or unpopular. They come from brave, noble, daring men, who are not afraid of criticism, else they would never enter such an arena of public discussion. The advanced ideas they present have generally been previously tried in the fire of scathing criticism, and have all the dross eliminated therefrom, and they seek the truth for truth's sake alone. In proportion as our newspapers encourage the tolerant hearing 'of their readers by their readers,' in their columns, they become less autocratic and more democratic.

"Though on some points I diametrically disagree with Mr. Livesey, yet I must concede that editors generally have shown such a high appreciation of his articles that they have appeared in scores of newspapers from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from Mexico to Canada, and Sykesville, Md., is actually becoming famous as the town in which he lives. His vigorous advocacy of unlimited 'equal freedom' on every possible occasion has won him hosts of friends all over the United States, and he has been asked to edit departments in several progressive papers.

"Most of our ablest lawyers, lecturers, and orators owe their success largely to their early beginnings in debating or literary societies, where views are not expressed with the studious deliberation and accuracy of articles written for publication. How much more advantageous, therefore, must newspaper discussions be to all concerned. Criticism develops reason, compels research, and promotes progress. Editors who print nothing from their readers either disrespect their readers' sentiment, or lack readers sufficiently intelligent to have and express views of their own, or have no readers worth addressing any remarks to.

"Just as verbal discussions attract the eager attention of all within hearing, so printed discussions attract the rapt attention of all who notice them, and the power of a newspaper increases in proportion as it exhibits the fairness to equally hear all sides of all important questions."

A GENTLE REMINDER. Will our friends and subscribers kindly remember that it takes money, and a good deal of money, to publish a radical weekly paper in a large city? Please remember also that Lucifer has no "Sustaining Fund," no "Sustaining Club," as have nearly all other radical papers. That it depends wholly upon equitable co-operation,—dues on subscription and sale of its pamphlets and other literature, and not on donations, for the means of meeting its weekly and monthly bills. We are now entering the twenty-second year of publication under the same editorial management, consequently Lucifer is no mushroom growth, no infant of yesterday, but notwithstanding its years it cannot live without the constant helpful effort of those who believe in its work,—who believe in the necessity of persistent, never-ending agitation of the question of BETTER IDEALS, as well as better conditions, for the building of a better race of human beings, in order that the evils of our present social and economic life may be removed. DEBT is a hard task-master; will our friends do what they can to save Lucifer from such bondage?

Is It any Wonder?

Prominent among the large daily papers that ask for and publish "letters from the people," is "The Chicago American." In its issue of July 1, "Editorial page," appears the following:

W. R. Hearst, Editor "Chicago American"—DEAR SIR: I notice that some of your correspondents do not believe the doctrine of eternal punishment. Permit me to say to them through the columns of your paper: If there is no future everlasting punishment of the wicked Christ and his apostles could have scarcely spoken more delusively had such been their constant and studious aim.

If there is no future everlasting punishment of the wicked, there may be no future everlasting reward of the righteous; for the Bible is equally copious and emphatic in relation to both and speaks in the same terms of the duration of each. If there is no future everlasting punishment of the wicked, there is no proof in the Bible of the future everlasting existence of the soul; for the same modes of expression are applied to the one and the other.

If there is no future punishment, the Bible is the most deceptive book that was ever written, and the prophets and the apostles and their Lord were the least reliable teachers that ever lived. If an earthly judge should refuse to pass sentence on a criminal, would these men indorse his action? Why should they try to prove that God is not just—that he does not reward man according to his works—that there is no difference between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not; that to pray or to blaspheme, to be a Judas or a John is all the same, a matter of perfect indifference which can have no effect upon our final and eternal state? And why do they wish to prove what is so dishonorable to God and His moral government? To quiet an annoying conscience that they may sin without remorse? I judge no man's motives, but indications are certainly unfavorable. REV. A. R. ADAMS.

Toluca, Ill.

We are sometimes told that the doctrine of endless future punishment for the unbelieving and the impenitent is no longer popular and no longer preached from the pulpit and by church journals, etc. While it is true that the so-called "higher criticism" has done something to gloss over and explain away the horrors of the orthodox Christian creeds, it is doubtless true that from most pulpits in all lands called Christian; also in the weekly prayer meetings of all orthodox Christian churches; also in their prayer-books, and "confessions of faith;" in their "Bible commentaries" and other church literature—to say nothing of the periodic "revival" cyclones, of the Moody and Sam Jones' variety, or of the ubiquitous "Salvation Army" crusaders—in and by all of these, as well as in and by the daily prayers, hymns, and exhortations in families, it is doubtless true that the common people, the every day thought of the great mass of people in all lands called Christian, is colored, is saturated, and permeated, as it were, by faith in the awful doctrine defended by Rev. A. R. Adams in the "Chicago American."

Such being the admitted facts of the case—such being the substratum of thought and sentiment from which spring all acts, whether of a public or private nature, is it any cause for wonder that things are as we find them?

Is it any wonder that men—and women too—are cruel and unsympathetic in their treatment of their fellow human beings?

Is it any wonder that men who believe in and worship a God that will punish forever his own children for the mistakes—CRIMES, if you please, of a few fleeting years, would readily accept the present economic system that robs the many—makes HELL for the many, for the benefit of a fortunate few?

Can we wonder that wars of aggression and conquest are popular in all Christian lands, and that the most strenuous advocates of war are found among the Christian clergy themselves?

Can we wonder that the Christian clergy should be the chief defenders of a marriage system that holds in unwilling bondage millions of human beings? A system that makes of the home a miniature hell, by denying the right to correct mistakes and reconstruct the relations upon which the home is founded? M. H.

Evolution of Marriage:

Or the "Failure of Socalled Free Unions" was the subject of discussion at the last meeting of the Chicago Lucifer Club, on the evening of June 25. A full house greeted the first speaker, Emma Goldman of New York, who has been lecturing in Chicago and vicinity for several weeks past. Among those present were six physicians and one dental surgeon—three of whom were women; also several authors and editors.

The opening address began at 8 o'clock and occupied about thirty minutes, followed by free discussion lasting until ten, or later. Among the hearers were a number of strange faces, but the close attention given to the speakers showed that all were deeply interested. Among the many comments by her hearers upon the address of the first speaker, is the following, sent in by one who prefers that name should not be published:

Emma Goldman has not yet rid herself of the superstition known as slavery. In her talk at the Lucifer meeting last week she, and others, expressed the opinion that if one person submitted to terms of association made by another person, the former is a slave. If so, there can be no such thing as free contract. Most of us believe that people may agree on terms, and are free, even if they yield certain points for the sake of association. It is impossible for one mind to control another except by persuasion, which is not slavery, but one of the elements of free contract. If one person cannot control the mind of another he cannot control the acts of another, hence there is no such thing as slavery. This applies to all attempts at control from the mildest suasion down to the lash of the tyrant. "Uncle Tom" of the play would not be moved by the lash nor its alternative, so died a free man. Many tribes of men cannot be made to obey, and the attempt to compel them is always abandoned. The tyrant can only arrange conditions; he cannot force compliance. Neither can a wife or husband be compelled to obey. A sense of duty may cause compliance, but conscience is not a tyrant. It is a part of the mental make-up which we wish shall be free. Why cite marriage as the one relation where inharmony occurs? There is friction between parents and children, master and servant, neighbors, etc., simply because people are not taught human rights, equality, justice, in youth, along with their other lessons.

Expecting to publish a synopsis of the address aforesaid, and also synopses of the remarks of some of the critics, the further consideration of the subject is postponed till next week. M. H.

Institutional Marriage

Is the title of the June number of the Light-Bearer Library, now being sent to subscribers and exchanges. This is the closing number of Vol. I. of our little monthly magazine, and consists of a lecture delivered by M. Harman at Oriental Hall, Masonic Temple, this city, March 31 of the present year.

TEMPORARY SUSPENSION.

Acting upon the advice of friends in whose judgment we have much confidence it has been decided to suspend, until January of next year, the further publication of the Light-Bearer Library. The chief reason for such suspension is the necessity for concentration upon getting through the press the autobiography of Lucifer's editor—a book long promised and long delayed because of lack of health and strength on the part of the author thereof. When this book is finished and sent to subscribers it is hoped the publication of the monthly Library will be resumed.

Meantime those who have subscribed and paid for another year of the monthly and who prefer not to wait for its reappearance, can have what is due them in other literature, or, on application, can have their money refunded. M. HARMAN.

Notes and Comments.

Among the many kindly appreciative letters that have been received at this office within the past few weeks I am permitted to reproduce the following. Replying to a marked copy of Lucifer containing quotations from his letter to the ecclesiastical court, with remarks thereon, Prof. Herron wrote in part:

New York, 59 W. 45th. Street, June 17, 1901.

MY DEAR MR. HARMAN:—I thank you most heartily for your comprehensive and noble words of interpretation and defense; they cannot but help to disclose the real issue between liberty and the ownership of human beings by human beings; for this is the real issue between the old and the new civilization. It has been impossible for me to speak of my personal problem. So I have tried to find such rest as I could at the heart of the storm, and defend the impersonal principles involved in the controversy. I had expected to give my life to the economic problem of civilization chiefly, and never expected to be forced into such a position as I find myself; but since I have been forced into this position I can only accept the issue, and abide by the principles stated in my church letter. I thank you most heartily for offering to send me a file of the papers. I shall be very glad if you will send them to me. I have been meaning to send you a subscription for them as I want to read the paper regularly.

Faithfully Yours, GEORGE D. HERRON.

To some readers it may seem unfortunate that Prof. Herron should be forced to leave even temporarily the discussion of the "economic problems of civilization," but by others who have closely watched the work of the famous lecturer it is regarded as decidedly the most fortunate thing that could have happened, that he has been "forced into the position" in which he now finds himself. As some of these friends see it, Prof. Herron is now entering upon a far more important work than that of overthrowing economic superstitions. His energies will now be directed, for a time at least, "to a greater work than he knew—the emancipation of the world from the most vital and far reaching of all slaveries—sex-bondage," as one of these intimate friends expressed it, in a private letter to this office.

Here are two clippings from exchanges that were put in type some weeks ago but side-tracked for lack of room in the forms, but though a little out of date so far as the calendar is concerned, are really as pertinent and valuable now as they ever were. The first refers to the instructions of a Kentucky judge to the grand jury of his court, and shows that though our judicial system is bound fast in the meshes of custom and very seldom catches a glimpse of the real causes of vice and crime, there are exceptions to the rule. This Judge Cantrill no doubt made himself obnoxious to churchmen as well as to conventional moralists, by the following unorthodox utterance:

"Judge Cantrill in his charge to the grand jury said that the theory of the great educators that intellectual development produced moral elevation was exploded by the last century's experience, not only in Kentucky, but in other states, as crime and vice had kept pace with the times and society was in a more chaotic state now than forty years ago. He said there are defalcations by men who cloak their crimes with religious devotion and Sunday school attendance, and then after a whole community had been wrecked the people associated with the defaulter in a religious way seek to shield him and prevent the law from inflicting a proper punishment, thus leaving a bad impression on the young generation and encouraging crime."

The next clipping refers to the visit of Peter Kropotkin, the Russian scholar, author and lecturer who came to Chicago a few months ago preaching the same gospel—almost in the same language—that caused the death on the gallows of the labor martyrs, Parsons, Spies, Engel and Fisher. Here is what an industrial exchange said of the visit of the distinguished Russian exile:

"Another strange feature about this strange old world of ours is the reception of Prince Kropotkin in Chicago. Supposing this Russian socialist—anarchist, untitled, unannounced and unknown, had lighted the darkness of that mighty Babylon a quarter of a century ago, Jane Addams might have received him as such loving souls received Jesus in those old, old days of Phariseeism, but Mr. Emmons Blaine and Chicago's 'four hundred' never.

"His philosophy, which banished him from the rule of czars, would have placed him in the ranks of the 'Haymarket rioters' in that city fifteen years ago. Engels and Spies were men of loving souls who only proclaimed the philosophy to which Chicago school boards listen from the lips of Prince Kropotkin. It was easy then to fasten the brutality of Pinkerton thugs and special police upon such gentle, loving men as Spies and Engels, but the world must be growing wiser or more foolish (hard to tell which), for a titled prince comes to that same city, with the self-same philosophy, and lo, the mighty Babylon falls at his feet to do homage."

A man ought to be as free to select his physician as his blacksmith for he alone is to profit or suffer by his choice. The responsibility is his.—Wm. E. Gladstone.

A Kansas Woman's Greeting.

BY MYRA PEPPER.

Your editorial, "The Battle is On," with quotations from the press and from Prof. Herron's letter to the court, should stir every reader of Lucifer to such extent that each should express his views on this most important phase of serfdom.

All honor to Prof. Herron! He dares to be true to his convictions even when the price is the obloquy and persecution of church and society. It is because of the slavery to creeds and customs that thousands dare not live out their convictions. I know only too well what it costs for a woman to assert her right to her own body.

I know a woman, who, having raised a family of children, found it impossible to accede to the sexual demands of her husband—from ill-health and other reasons. Knowing the disgrace attached to separation, knowing the "ways of the world," she begged her husband to allow her freedom in her home, told him he was free to associate intimately wherever he chose, and all she asked was to be free. She would work for him and children—the world should know nothing, and her life would be happier.

But no! He protested that she belonged to him! that he did not want to go anywhere else for favors; that she had agreed to this when the marriage ceremony was said, and he would have his rights.

Then came the struggle for the woman. Should she yield her body a sacrifice to lust and slavery? or should she leave home and face the world? She chose the latter, penniless and lacking in strength she is today a wage-slave in a western town, earning a bare living for herself and little daughter, persecuted by her owner in letters and threats that he will take the daughter from her.

I cannot understand why any man desires an unwilling consort. It must be as Elizabeth Cady Stanton says, that rape is the usual relation between men and women. If people only knew that the sweetness and purity of sex relations depends upon the reciprocity that exists, they would surely know better than to regulate such relations by law. "Freedom in a cottage or a hovel is better than marriage in a mansion," is one of the truest sentences ever written, and I thank Francis Barry and all other writers who dare to defend women in their struggle for emancipation.

I noticed in "Kansas City Star" the other day that some man has left money to give to those who conform to a certain size in selecting mates—he wants to increase the size of our race. It might be well to allow people to select their own mates. Freedom is what we want. I hope to be one of the Press-Writers if I get time. Just now I am not fit to write, but want to send my word of greeting and good will to Lucifer, and through it to Prof. Herron, and all who champion his attitude. I would like to see the names of the radicals who accept Prof. Herron's views of marriage.

Says "Boston Ideas"—

"Marriage" by Juliet H. Severance, M. D., is a fearless, straightforward presentation of a subject whose social perplexities need scientific attention. It is a mighty arraignment of the legal institution of marriage and faithfully states the exact condition of things known to prevail only too broadly in our land as well as in all the world.

It is a vigorous overhauling of facts that need facing and deserves reading at the hands of all earnest Americans. Certain laws that still remain on our statutes are so revolting in their barbarous injustice as to sufficiently explain, to the inquiry of conservative men, why women are becoming increasingly anxious to obtain their right to help make the laws that govern them. Dr. Severance's address is keen, sarcastic, incisive—characterized by just those elements that cause her words to penetrate determinedly to the attention of all readers. She is in deadly earnest and she makes her points so plainly and unmistakably as to cause the sensitive to shudder; but there are certainly too many men who need the matter presented to them without gilding or coloring before they can or will see the truth of the situation.

Dr. Severance is an eloquent pleader for personal freedom and in the article following "Marriage"—"The Medical Monopoly"—she places the attempts of certain schools of medicine to obtain legislation in their favor as against quacks, just where they belong—under the head of would-be legalized tyranny. There are yet many bonds to be broken in our "land of the free."

Strassburg Geese and Other Allegories.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Light-Bearer Library No. 11, ought to be enough to convince every reader of the need of equal rights for man and woman; equal in the home, before the law and everywhere.

The story of the Geese is well told and very interesting.

The "Traveler's Tale" of one of the Hill Tribes of India who believed eating to be a necessary evil, but coarse, vulgar immodest and improper, is perfectly ridiculous; yet all the time one can see how well it represents the sex question. The fact that when children get together alone they tell each other naughty stories about eating and that in school when any passage is read which suggests food in the most distant way, a grin goes round the class, shows how easy it is to prejudice people against the most innocent and even useful things of life.

I hope friends will order this little gem of a book and scatter it far and wide till every enslaved mind shall see perfect freedom as the greatest of all goods.

"Kidnapped Millionaires."

Is the title of a forth coming book by Frederic U. Adams, the well-known author of "President John Smith," and editor for several years of the "New Time." The book has been highly praised by the critics. Those who have read Mr. Adams' books and editorials will doubtless want to read this his latest and probably his most important work. Published by the Lathrop Pub., Co., of Boston. Price, $1.50.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Fred Ulmer, Silver City, Idaho:—Enclosed find postoffice money order for one dollar for renewal of subscription of Lucifer for one year. Lucifer contains food for the thinker. I would not be without it any more.

Zavier Randeau, Hennessey, Okla.:—I have been reading your paper and am very much delighted with it. I have long been aware that Anarchy was misrepresented. Being a Socialist I cannot agree with you in every thing but I am willing to investigate, so I enclose you one dollar for "Cityless and Countryless World."

Walter Breem, Omaha, Neb.:—Permit me to rise and second the motion made by D. Webster Groh that you publish (in small type so as not to trench too much on Lucifer space for other work) a list of the names and addresses of the Press-Writers. Armstrong will no doubt be able to furnish the list. Nearly all the readers of Lucifer are Liberals and we all of us understand that the paramount issue today is organization or associative effort. I enclose one dollar on subscription for next year.

Belle C., Pa.:—Inclosed find a little "say" in answer to your editorial in May 11; no doubt you will have so much that is better that mine will get in the waste basket instead of the paper. However, it makes no difference to me, as I have had the pleasure of writing it. . . . If I marry a man and have his love it is mine, and no one can deprive me of my own. If I have not his love, a matrimonial lie may make it appear that I have his love when the fact is I have not. All love is so hinged on material support that one must be very discerning indeed to recognize the real thing.

[The "little say" was published last week. It would be well, as I think, if we could all remember that the writing of a good article brings its own subjective reward. No writer of merit, or demerit, ever had the fortune or misfortune, to see all of her or his writings in print. M. H.]

Hortense M. Phelps, Lily Dale, New York:—I have been reading your paper that was loaned me by friends. Am glad you have courage to stand up for right and justice on the marriage question. What bondage the world is in, regarding marriage. What suffering for both men and women, but the pure in heart only could know how to use freedom in this relation. I have been a nurse for years, and have seen the curse of our present system of living, for both men and women. They are linked together though sick of the sight of each other; yet children must be born under these conditions. Extreme poverty adds its terrors often. Under these circumstances it is not strange that death is often preferred to the cursed tie that binds people together. Some men are slaves to butterfly women—spending their lives in the effort to supply them with useless luxuries.

Clara Peterson, Santa Clara, Cal.:—Enclosed find two dollars I promised to pay two years ago, for Lucifer received on credit. Lucifer was such a help to me. Oh how I enjoyed its fearless words and how my heart responded to the ideas. Lucifer has helped to mould me. My nationality is Swedish. I could not speak or read English when I took up Lucifer. I just guessed and loved the words into my understanding, and they were salvation to me. I'll never forget. I am so glad to be able to show a little of what I feel. I hope to be rich, and I'll call again. Send me some recent copies.

[It is because of such letters as these, in good measure, that we have been enabled to persevere under discouragements that seemed often insurmountable. We had lost sight of Mrs. Peterson, but she did not forget us, and after a lapse of more than two years now sends her arrearage on the paper. Her name shall be re-entered on our list and we will hope not to part company soon again. M. H.]

Joseph M. Bare, Ligonier, Ind. An up-to-date dialogue:

Little Son: "Pa, what is obscenity?"

Father: "Oh! it's something that afflicts people when they are afraid some one else will enjoy themselves."

L. S.: "Enjoy themselves. In what way, pa?"

F.: "Oh reading something which they think is very nice and exciting."

L. S.: "Why, pa, I thought obscenity must be something that growed."

F.: "You are partly right, my son. It is usually grafted onto a Comp-stock!"

"THE FREETHOUGHT IDEAL" of Ottawa, Kansas, Etta Semple editor and publisher, is now an eight page weekly, instead of fortnightly, as formerly. We are always glad to record evidences of prosperity in our wide-awake Freethought contemporaries, and especially when, as in this case, the editor is an old time friend and faithful helper in the long drawn out fight for free press,—and for the right of self-ownership for woman, in the courts of Kansas. The "Ideal" is well printed in large type, and is cheap at the price, one dollar per year.

"PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL AND SCIENCE OF HEALTH."

The July special midsummer number contains a sketch of the late Mrs C. F. Wells. There is an attractive article on The Hall of Fame, illustrated with many beautiful and rare portraits.

Phrenotype (36) by H. S. Drayton, M. D.

The Child Culture Department is particularly instructive this month. Helpful articles on Hygiene, Food and Disease among children by Drs. Holbrook, E. P. Miller, and C. H. Shepard. There is a highly instructive article on Negroes and their characteristics by J. A. Fowler. New York, $1, per. year.

CHANGES AND CREDITS on mailing list are now made but once each month. When, therefore, our friends do not see the number on their tabs changed promptly they will understand the cause. Our mailing list is now set by a linotype machine, hence changes and eliminations cannot be so promptly nor so cheaply attended to. No loss of numbers, however, will be sustained by subscribers, as duplicate copies will be sent to them at their new place, when notified of change.

DR. FOOTE'S NEW BOOK.

THE HOME CYCLOPEDIA

OF POPULAR MEDICAL, SOCIAL, AND SEXUAL SCIENCE.

Contains a full, plain, and easy reading treatise on "Health and Disease, with Recipes," all the average reader can profitably learn of personal hygiene and common diseases (including special, separate chapters for men and women); all right up to date, and fully illustrated with hundreds of photo-engravings and chromo-lithographs. Contains also the already popular "Plain Home Talk" about the relations of the sexes and social customs in all ages and all countries, with "original and startling" suggestions for social reforms; newly revised, enlarged, and well illustrated. All is "heart to heart" plain home talk from a clear-thinking, plain-speaking, liberal minded medical author of over forty years experience. Nearly 1,000,000 of his former books sold. A curious book for curious people, and a sensible book for every one. Answers 1,000 delicate questions one would like to ask his regular physician and yet doesn't want to.

1,248 pages, 400 illustrations, (82 in colors), 276 recipes. Price. Cloth bound, $2, mailed. Address Lucifer Office, 500 Fulton St. Chicago.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS. Karl Heinzen. A new edition, together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German Women at Frauenstadt. A book of 336 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Cloth, $1.

RULED BY THE TOMB. A discussion of free thought and free love. Orford Northcote. 10c.

AUTONOMY, SELF-LAW. A fragmentary dissertation on the right to non-invasive self-hood. 3c.

A PHYSICIAN IN THE HOUSE. A New Family Medical Work, by Dr. J. H. Greer. This book is up-to-date in every particular. It will save you hundreds of dollars in doctors' bills. It tells you how to cure yourself by simple and harmless home remedies. It recommends no poisonous or dangerous drugs. It teaches how to save health and life by safe methods. It teaches prevention—that it is better to know how to live and avoid disease than to take any medicine as a cure. It is not an advertisement and has no medicine to sell. It has hundreds of excellent recipes for the cure of the various diseases. It has 16 colored plates showing different parts of the human body. The chapter on Painless Midwifery is worth its weight in gold to women. The "Care of Children" is something every mother ought to read. It teaches the value of Air, Sunshine, and Water as medicines. It contains valuable information for the married. This book cannot fail to please you. If you are looking for health by the safest and easiest means, do not delay getting it. It has eight hundred pages, is neatly bound in cloth, with gold letters, and will be sent by mail or express, prepaid to any address, for $2.75.

BIBLE TEMPERANCE. E. C. Walker. Proving that Liquor Drinking is Commended, Defended and Enjoined by the Bible, and giving close reference to the chapters and verses. 10c.

CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD. Henry Olerich. The author of this epoch-making book tells in a very charming way the story of the evolution of human society on the planet Mars, and in so doing outlines a practicable way out of the slaveries now endured by earth's inhabitants. Handsomely bound in red silk, with gold lettering on back and sides; 447 pages. Price, $1; paper, 60c.

LIBERTY IN LITERATURE. Testimonial to Walt Whitman. "Let us put wreaths on the brows of the living." An address delivered in Philadelphia, Oct. 21, 1890, with portrait of Whitman. Containing also Col. Ingersoll's address at the funeral of Walt Whitman, Mar. 30, 1892. Cloth, 50c; paper, 25c.

MARTYRDOM OF MAN. Winwood Reade. This is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how war and religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for liberty; and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. Winwood Reade's reputation as a writer of fine English, of deep study and careful reasoning, needs no word of praise. Cloth, $1.

MEN, WOMEN, AND GODS. Helen H. Gardener. With preface by Col. R. G. Ingersoll. Contents: Introduction by Col. Ingersoll. Men, Women, and Gods. Vicarious Atonement. Historical Facts and Theological Fictions. Appendix. Address to the Clergy and Others. Letter to Cleveland Congress of Freethinkers. The only authorized and correct edition. Large 12mo, heavy-toned paper. Portrait. This volume is by far the best writing this famous author ever did. It is very fine. Cloth, $1; paper, 50c.

MISSING LINK IN MODERN SPIRITUALISM, THE. A. Leah (Fox) Underhill. With portraits of the Fox Sisters and others. 478 pages. Cloth. Reduced to $1.

MORIBUND SOCIETY AND ANARCHY. Jean Grave. Cloth, 60c; paper, 25c.

MUTUAL BANKING. A simple plan to abolish interest on money. William B. Greene. 10c.

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL GUESSES. E. C. Walker. Contents: Love and Law; The Moloch of the Monogamic Ideal; The Continuity of Race-Life, and Tyranny; Food and Sex Fallacies, a Criticism; When Men and Women Are and When They Are Not Varietists; The New Woman: What is she? What will she be? The State Hiding Behind Its Own Mistakes; Bishop Potter's Opinion of Divorce; Love: Its Attraction and Expression; Is She an Honest Girl? Lloyd, Platt, and the Pitiful Facts; Social Radicals and Parentage; Anthropology and Monogamy; Love and Trust Versus Fear; Reflections upon Reading William Platt's "Women, Love, and Life."

RELIGION AND RATIONALISM. The relation of each to human liberty. The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. E. C. Walker. 5c.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Thomas Paine. Answer to Burke's attack upon the French revolution. A political treatise of great general value, as advocating liberty and democracy. Contains the fundamental principles of true republicanism. Cloth, 50c; paper, 25c.

RUBAIYAT (Quatrains) OF OMAR KHAYYAM. Edward FitzGerald's interpretation; with original introduction; special cover; latest version. Paper, 10c.

SONGS OF THE UNBLIND CUPID. J. Wm. Lloyd. Edition de luxe. Verses printed from Kelmscott type upon deckle edged hand made paper of cerulean tint. Initial letters, ornaments and borders are in red; initial letter and sketch upon the opening page are hand painted in water colors. Covers brown, with choice of silver or gold lettering. Very handsome gift book. 20c.

THE WOMAN WHO DID. Grant Allen. A powerful story of a refined, educated and high-spirited woman who dared to defy the tyranny of church and state and ignore the institution of marriage. Handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

THE BRITISH BARBARIANS. Grant Allen, the greatest of the Hill-Top pioneers. Dedicated "to all who have heart enough, brain enough, and soul enough to understand it." Handsomely bound in cloth. 281 pages. $1.

THE REVIVAL OF PURITANISM. E. C. Walker. 10c.

THOMAS JEFFERSON. His Political, Social and Religious Philosophy. Gen. M. M. Trumbull. 5c.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old ascetism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new hedonism says: 'Be happy and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and ascetism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproductive function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; twelve copies, 50c. Single copy, 5c.

THE WORM TURNS. Revolutionary Poems. Voltairine de Cleyre. 10c.

THE CHICAGO MARTYRS. The famous speeches of the eight condemned anarchists in Judge Gary's Court, and Altgeld's reasons for pardoning Fielden, Neebe and Schwab. 25c.

TRAVELS IN FAITH. By Capt. Robert C. Adams. His mental experience from superstition to rationalism. Cloth, 75c; paper, 25c.

THE SANCTITY OF MARRIAGE. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution, its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25c to 10c.

VINDICATION OF THOMAS PAINE. Col. R. G. Ingersoll. Dealing with all the slanders brought against the name and fame of Paine. A little pamphlet which every admirer of Thomas Paine should have by him for reference. Paper, 15c.

WHAT IS PROPERTY? An Inquiry into the Principle of Right and of Government. P. J. Proudhon. Translated by B. R. Tucker. 500 pages. Cloth. (Slightly shelf-worn.) Reduced to $1.

WHEN IS FREEDOM FREE OR EQUALITY EQUAL in the Social Evil or in Marriage? Orr W. Lee. 10c.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE. Matilda Joslyn Gage. This is Mrs. Gage's last and crowning work. Every woman ought to read it. Every liberal woman and man will want it. A burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do. Cloth, $1.50; paper, 75c.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW: a Primer of Sexual Rationalism. Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10c.

THE COMING WOMAN. Lillie D. White. 5c.

WHAT IS RELIGION? Ingersoll's last public address, delivered at the meeting of the Free Religious Association in Boston on June 2, 1899. To which is appended the poem, "Declaration of the Free," the last verse written by the great Freethinker. 5c.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo, 172 pages. 25c.

WHEN LOVE IS LIBERTY AND NATURE LAW. John Badcock, Jr. 10c.

TRUE FREEDOM.

Is true Freedom but to break fetters for our own dear sake,
And, with leather hearts, forget that we owe mankind a debt?
No! true freedom is to share all the chains our brothers wear,
And, with heart and hand, to be earnest to make others free!

They are slaves who fear to speak for the fallen and the weak;
They are slaves who will not choose hatred, scoffing, and abuse,
Rather than in silence shrink from the truth they needs must think;
They are slaves who dare not be in the right with two or three.

Institutional Marriage.

BY M. HARMAN.

(Extract from a lecture delivered before the Chicago Society of Anthropology, March 31, 1901.)

Profoundly impressed with a sense of the extreme difficulty of getting people to hear without prejudice a plainly worded, honest and candid presentation of this marriage question I have decided to use on this occasion a little harmless strategy. While giving my hearers the credit of being thinkers and philosophers I judge you by what I know of myself when I say that you look at the marriage problem "with a veil before your eyes," as Paul said of the Hebrews when "Moses and the prophets were read."

In order to get rid—in some degree, of the halo, the mist, the mysticism that envelopes the subject under discussion I propose for the time being to resort to a little fiction. All fictions are not lies,—at least not malicious lies. I shall assume that you know nothing of marriage—neither by personal experience nor by observation; that you are not inhabitants of this earth at all; that you are living on the planet Mars, which, as astronomers tell us, is much older than the planet called Earth. I shall assume that long ages ago the Marsites evoluted out of the realm of the grosser bodily senses; thatyou are now wholly out of the propagative plane; that the birth and rearing of children are no longer necessary on the planet Mars because of the fact that you have learned how to renew your youth whenever it pleases you to do so. And that having thus left the grossly physical and the sensuous you are now prepared to investigate without prejudice, and from a purely scientific standpoint, the form of serfdom known as institutional marriage.

I shall assume, that like yourselves I am a Marsite, or Martian, and that as a punishment for my sins I was banished about seventy years ago to the younger, the cruder and less developed planet Earth, but that now, my term of banishment ended I am permitted to return to my native land—my native heath or heaven, and that in a beautiful hall two hundred feet above ground, and overlooking a beautiful inland sea I find myself trying to tell you something of my experiences and observations among the Earthites.

Proceeding then as best I can, let me say to my friendly hearers—no, I don't mean that, of course; I mean my friendly telepathists, let me say that I found the Earthites living very material lives, very sensuous lives; that their bodily senses are six in number, namely

1. Sight;
2. Hearing;
3. Taste, or the gustatory sense;
4. Smell;
5. Touch. or the sense of feeling;
6. Gender, or the sense that finds its use and manifestation in the differentiation called sex.

All these senses have their specific organs or instruments of use, in the complex organism of what Earthites call vertebrate animals, the most important species or genus of which is called man—which term is made to do duty for the two halves of the genus, the masculine and the feminine, the masculine half being called by the generic term man, by way of emphasis or honor, and the feminine half being called woman—wo-man. Just why the feminine man should be called wo-man I was never able fully to find out during my seventy years of exile. Some lexicographers said woman means womb-man,or man-with-a-womb, which latter term means the creatory, or the cellular apartment in the organism of feminine man set apart for the creation of children or the development of new human organisms.

To me it seemed quite appropriate to call feminine man woe-man because of the fact that this half was compelled to bear more than an equal share of woe and of sorrow. This view is confirmed by an ancient legendary document that I have sometimes consulted, called Genesis, which document is believed by many Earthites to give a correct account of the origin or introduction of human beings on their planet.

According to this legendary account the first feminine man was of an enquiring turn of mind and, in her search for knowledge, ate of what was called "the forbidden fruit." As a punishment for this act of disobedience her creator and judge pronounced upon her this curse:

"I will greatly multiply thy sorrow [thy woe] and thy conception. In sorrow [woe] shalt thou bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband and he shall rule over thee."

Here then would seem to be the origin of the term wo-man, and also the authority for the serfdom of woman in the institution called by the Earthites marriage; at least for all Earthites who accept as of divine or binding authority the compilation of books of which the booklet called Genesis is the first. By this sentence feminine man was condemned to a life of woe as child-bearer, and to be the serf of masculine man.

This view of the relative position of the two halves of the genus man is borne out by the dictionaries, the law books, the legal decisions of the nations of Earth calling themselves civilized and enlightened; also by the obligations entered into at the time of marriage, and by the general legal and political status of the feminine half of the population.

Looking for definitions of marriage I found the term itself derived from mari, meaning "husband." That is, marriage was instituted for the use and benefit of masculine man and not of feminine man. The term husband is derived from hus, a "house," and bonda, a "boor," a "peasant" or farmer. Hence the dictionary says husband means the "master of the house." The word boor commonly means a man of rude manners, and it always seemed to me very appropriate as explaining the term husband, since my observations showed that the husband can enact the boor towards his wife—his woman—with perfect impunity, whereas boorish manners towards a woman not his wife would be resented, if not punished in some way.

Looking up the word "wife"—the term used as the feminine of the masculine "husband," I found that it did not mean "mistress of the house," as husband means master of the house—that "wife" is not by derivation a word of honor at all, but rather the reverse; being derived from the same root word as "weaver," a menial household employment in olden times similar to that of kitchen-servant or "scullion;" and thus by both derivation and immemorial custom the word wife came to mean a household drudge, a servant without wages, but to whose other numerous employments were added the duty of satisfying her husband's sex-appetite—his gender sense—and also that of bearing to him children—especially sons, of whose paternity there could be no reasonable doubt, so that the master of the house could have an heir of his own begetting to inherit his estate.

The fact also that the wife was required to take the family name of her husband, the same as his other bond slaves or chattels, is additional proof that "wife" was not intended to be a title of honor, as was that of "husband," but rather a token, a badge, of servitude, of serfdom.

The history of marriage, as I learned it in ancient Earthite manuscripts, brought out strongly this conception of the institution, as a leading feature. As soon as man began to accumulate property,—horses and cattle, fields and houses, gold, silver, etc., he found that he needed slaves, serfs, to help him to accumulate, and to help care for his accumulations; so he bound the woman—the weaker and more dependent half of the human species, to himself as a servant, a household drudge, and as a convenient minister to his gender sense or appetite, and lest she should become tired of his service, lest she should want to be self-owning, or want to serve some other man in these capacities be bound the woman to himself for life, and by the most solemn of religious rites, public ceremonies, and vows of obedience, of eternal constancy and affection, and as men made all the laws they gave to each other the legal right to kill their wives if they should become "unfaithful" to their marriage vows; also the right to kill the man who should invade the husband's vested right of property in the person and service of his particular wo man, or wo-men—pronounced wimmen.

The Right Use of a 'Pithy Phrase,"

BY C. L. JAMES.

Having been assured in "Free Society," and by a personal letter, that I might have answered E. C. Walker's "Perversion of a Pithy Phrase" through Lucifer, I suppose there can be no objection to my doing so now. I will try to be concise. Mr. Walker calls me "the old gentleman." I believe we were born in the same year (1846); but I accept the title, and will suggest to him a piece of old man's wisdom; which is not to be so impulsive; not to "slop over;" not to go off at half-cock; as he did over McKinley's war of benevolent assimilation; above all, not to write of what he does not understand.

By neglecting these valuable rules, he has laid himself open to slaughter at almost every line. Surely, if I originated the expression, Movement in Favor of Ignorance, as he says, I must know better than he does what it means; and I apprehend little difficulty in showing that it applies to just such literature as the article I am answering. If I took "at their face value the pretentious claims of modern dogmatists" I might believe one like Clarkson when he says that "natural healers" who "never saw the inside of a vivisection hell" "usually" cure the worst cases, which have been given up by regular practitioners. But being in the habit of "examining" such assertions "critically and thoroughly" I have compared this one with the assertion of E. C. Walker himself in the "Iconoclast," that the great majority of death certificates are signed by regular physicians; and I have no difficulty in drawing the inference. The cases referred to by Clarkson were cases of people who had nothing the matter with them, "given up" by the regular practitioners as not medical When death certificates loom on the horizon, "natural healers" are fired out of the window and vivisectors called in at the door.

As Clarkson's position against "doctordom" was perfectly indiscriminate, I see no way to account for Walker's statement that it is fully sustained by many members of the medical profession, unless he means unqualified practitioners having no acknowledged place in the profession, but only in the ranks of humbug. If that is what he means Clarkson discriminated better than he. A doctor (docere, doctus sum) is one learned in an art—one qualified to teach it. A "natural healer," with a method which cannot be taught, is not a doctor—he is usually called a quack; but since this expression has been censured as discourteous, we'll call him a reviver of methods popular in the time of Jesus Christ, before observation and experiments (vivisection e. g.) had taught us to "know more about the universe than the old theologians." Clarkson's "position" plainly was that such practitioners are more successful than those who, by such other means, have learned some things which in Christ's time were not known. It looked improbable enough to be called absurd;—very decidedly in Favor of Ignorance—but at least there was no contradiction in it. There is a glaring one in Walker's. It is, indeed, true that medical men subject each other's theories and experiments to the strictest criticism; also that the Movement in Favor of Ignorance catches these up, misunderstands them, and parades them as proof that medical vivisection does not instruct.

But is it possible that Mr. Walker knows so little about the methods of science vs. those of dogma as not to see this proves the doctors are the scientists and their ignorant plagiarists the dogmatizers? It really looks that way; for though I know nothing about the personality of those "doctors" whom he cites—every child has heard of the principal vivisectionists and vaccinators, as Harvey, Jenner, Pasteur, Hahnneman, Lister, Koch—yet I do know enough about some other things than "the distant past" to say that certain sentiments which he quotes under a pompos medical title are not the sentiments of a scientist but an ignoramus. I refer particularly to the sentence "Bodily health is to be obtained by temperance, purity, cleanliness, fresh air, a contented and cheerful spirit, not by inoculating toxic poisons (sic) into our veins, or from the secrets to be dug out of the brains and entrails of tortured brutes." Does the individual quoted mean to say that "temperance, purity? cleanliness, fresh air, a contented and cheerful spirit," good as they certainly are, with a reservation about what he seems to mean by purity, will amputate a mangled limb successfully?

Does he mean to deny that the antiseptic treatment was "a secret dug out of the brains and entrails of tortured brutes?" Does he mean to deny that the antiseptic treatment has, not in "the distant past," but within the last twenty years, reduced the mortality in cases of amputation from about twenty-five per cent to less than three? Does he mean to deny that "the brains and entrails of tortured brutes" have, in this way, made every day occurrences of life-saving operations on human brains and entrails, such as in 1880 no one would have imagined possible? Does he deny that anæsthetics, which have removed the only objection to vivisection there ever was, is a "secret dug out of the brains and entrails of tortured brutes"; or that the tomb of the noble vivisector who discovered this secret is deservedly inscribed with the evangelical promise, "There shall be no more pain?" If he does—I should like to meet him instead of his dupes.

[TO BE CONCLUDED.]

A Physician's Testimony.

BY C. E. W.

It is strenuously insisted by the defenders of the scientific Inquisition that only the ignorance of the layman makes possible the denial of the great beneficence of vivisection, in being tacitly admitted that there is no excuse for the abominations of the phosiological laboratory if there is not enormous resulting benefit to the human race. The impression is sought to be given that regular medical men are a unit in the championship of vivisection, and hence these excerpts from the Presidential Address of George Wilson, M. D., M. A., L. L. D, at the meeting of the British Medical Association in 1899 possesses more than common interest. The subject was, "Bacteriological Research and Preventive Medicine." Doctor Wilson said, in part:

"In the brief interval at my disposal there is no subject on which I desire to speak out with more direct frankness and sincerity than the relations of bacteriological research and methods of treatment to preventive medicine. And at the outset, I may be permitted to say that ever since the great Pasteur announced the results of his prophyllactic inoculations with respect more especially to fowl cholera and anthrax, I have been a close, and, I hope, unbiased, student of bacteriological literature. I may say, too, that my attitude towards these newer methods of treatment was at first one of expectancy, though I could never see that there was any legitimate analogy between them and Jenner's great discovery, on which they are admittedly based, and the more I have studied them the more firmly I feel convinced that they are based on errors, and are the outcome of illogical inductions, every one of them. That, you will say, is a very strong statement to make, but after all these long years of flickering hope, I am prepared to contend that the indiscriminate maiming and slaughter of animal life with which these bacteriological methods of research and experimentation have been inseparably associated can not be proved to have saved one single human life, or lessened in any appreciable degree the load of human suffering. I have ventured to make that pronouncement before, but in halting academic fashion; I reiterate it here and now with the strongest and fullest conviction.

I have not allied myself to the Anti-Vivisectionisits, but I accuse my profession of misleading the public as to the cruelties and horrors which are perpetrated on animal life. Then it is stated that the actual pain involved in these experiments is commonly of the most trifling description, there is a suppressio veri of the most palpable kind, which could be accounted for at the time only by ignorance of the actual facts. I admit that in the mere operation of injecting a virus, whether cultivated or not, there may be little or no pain, but the cruelity does not lie in the operation itself, which is permitted to be performed without anæsthetics, but in the after-effects. Whether so-called toxins are injected under the skin, under the peritoneum, into the cranium under the dura mater, into the pleural cavity, into the veins, eyes, or other organs—and all these methods are ruthlessly practiced—there is the long-drawn-out agony. The animal so innocently operated on may have to live days, weeks, or months, with no anæsthetic to assuage its sufferings, and nothing but death to relieve.

"And what triumphs has bacteriology achieved in stemming the tide of human disease, on these empirical lines? Pasteur's antirabic vaccination is, I believe—and others with me—a delusion. Koch's tuberculin care of phthisis has long since been labelled as worse than worthless. As a test, even for bovine tuberculosis, tuberculin possesses only a secondary and not a specific value. The much vaunted anti-toxin cure for diptheria does not commend the universal approval of even the physicians of the metropolitan fever hospitals."

There has already been quoted the like emphatic opinion of Dr. Elmer Lee, a regular physician, of the American Association of Medicine. And there are many others, of all schools of medicine, who join the humanitariar layman in condemnation of vivisection. The solemn affirmations of such medical men are not to be blown away on the contemptuous breath which bears such epithets as "fools," "charlatans," and "incompetents." Nor can this testimony be disposed of by exhibiting the pale specter of the Roman church and talking irrelevantly of "The Movement in Favor of Ignorance." If there is no liberty save in lands "that have been Christian," as C. L. James sasy, then we need not fear Rome, for outside the pale of Rome there is not and never has been any simon-pure Christianity.

Why Does Love Die?—A Suggestion.

BY MABEL M'COY IRWIN.

"The mind hath a thousand eyes,
The heart but one;
Yet the light of the whole life dies
When love is done."

So true is it that life and love are one, that when a man ceases to love he ceases to live. The reason of this is not far to seek: If it be true that God—the Universal Essence which animates every creature—is love itself; if the source of our life is love, then we can possess just so much of life as we possess of love—love as expressed in every relation of life. When the question is asked "Why does love die?" we refer to that love which exists between man and woman, known as sex-love, since other loves live on. It is a very old question, and has doubtless been asked since the beginning of time. It has been answered in many ways, yet none seem to satisfy, as the query still goes on. There is an instinct in the heart of humanity—all evidence to the contrary—that love is immortal; and that when once felt in all the beauty of mutual fulness does not die; but lives ever on from glory unto glory. Behold two lovers, and you will see that each is the other's world. Time with them has ceased to be; they know nor wish to know nothing but the eternal now, and that now is love and more love. They hear the words "till death do you part" with quiet joy, smiling to themselves at the thought that death could have ought to do with love like theirs.

See this same man and woman a few years afterward. What has become of the flower and fragrance of their love? What means her troubled dissatisfied look? What means his air of restless indifference? What has taken place since that bridal morn that has so changed these two? What has become of the eager, blissful lovers? In their place you see a disillusioned, prosy married couple. Who of us has not seen this tragedy enacted before our eyes many times—the tragedy of dying love? In middle life and old age the eyes of men and women turn back to their youth as halcyon days, full of the power and faith of love's passion, and wonder if it could have been an illusion, or if somehow they missed their way along love's road.

Why does love die? Is there something in the nature of love that receives a blight as soon as it is touched by law? Does legal enactment destroy that which it would compel? Many have so thought; and some more venturesome than the others have taken to themselves husband or wife without the sanction of the law. Has love none the less died? Let those make answer who have thus ventured.

Still others give as reason why love dies, the fact that, while burning incense at the inmost shrine of love, we have not—as we should—kept lesser fires burning in the outer courts. They will tell us that it is impossible for one to wholly fill the life of another because of incompleteness; it is necessary therefore to have lesser loves to supplement the greatest, to keep love's altar bright. They will tell you that a trinity of persons is needed—not three in one as the heart insists—but one in three, to meet the needs of the growing man or woman if you would not have love die?

Since none of these satisfy one woman's heart, may I suggest another possible solution, which lies close at hand; but which man will not or does not heed? May I suggest that when everything else fails, this is sure to prove the death of love? The misuse of the sex function. The attempt to get the fragrance of the flower without its fruit? The sin of incompleteness in motive, that—like the hand of death—lies heavily upon the love-life of the world? In its last analysis sex-union can have but one meaning, to express completeness—the incarnating of two souls and bodies in one. 'Twere folly then to hope that love live on, when its supreme person for being is made abortive and dead. For truly—as Browning says—"'Tis in a child man and wife grow complete—one flesh."

Concerning Changes Proposed.

Among the answers sent us in regard to the changes in name, etc., proposed by Francis B. Livesey, of Sykesville, Md., for Lucifer are the following:

New York, 59 W. 45th Street, July 5, 1901.

MY DEAR MR. HARMAN:—I think your idea of enlarging your paper so as to make it a medium of wider expression, speaking for all forms of emancipation of human beings from the ownership of human beings, is valuable and worthy of all consideration. I heartily wish you success in your undertaking. I would say however that I am not fond of the word "reform" as it stands for so much that is dilettante and, to me, evasive. In the profoundest sense of the word, I am a revolutionist, and I should like to see you use some word for your paper that would convey the idea of revolution rather than reform; that is, if you are to make any change at all in the name.

Faithfully yours, GEO. D. HERRON.

Another—from J. C. Slafter, of Minneapolis, Minn., reads thus:

You ask for a brief expression of opinion regarding the remarks of Livesey upon the work of Lucifer &c. To myself, Lucifer fills a want and occupies a field which no other publication does; and if I were to suggest any change in matter it would be that it occupied more of its space with its specialty—"free, self-respecting and self-reliant motherhood." Your editorial, "Is Lucifer Narrow?" is first class. I do however agree with Livesey in his idea of using "Chicago" and the recognized date more prominently. Altogether I do not think it necessary to change the title, as he suggests, to "Chicago Lucifer." I think the object to which he refers can be accomplished without sacrificing the good and well known heading.

You are doing noble pioneer work and I personally don't want to see you switched off into some less important channel. I wish you all success in the work you have chosen.

Nearly every week I send a copy in a sealed envelope, so I am sure it will be opened, to some clergyman, editor, school teacher or other instructor.

Kate Austin and Cornelia Boecklin express like views—see "Voices" column.

Quite a considerable number of letters similar in tone, have reached us, too many for our limited space. Thanking the writers all for their kindness in responding, one more only, for this time, can be inserted—from Mary M. Clark of Albia, Iowa. While our good and zealous friend exhibits rather more feeling over the matter than the occasion would seem to call for, I think it best to grant to her the same freedom that was accorded to Brother Livesey. Freedom of expression is the safety valve that prevents deadly explosions. Under date July 7 our Iowa friend and long-time helper writes:

The weather is so intolerably warm that I can scarcely exist, but I get still warmer when I read some people's criticisms on Lucifer. With but a few minutes to spare I snatched up the little banner of freedom and read Mr. Livesey's article. Part of it makes me glad; part of it I seriously object to. Why should the name be changed? why should the thought-provoking, mind-spurring name Lucifer be sunken into the common, slushy, meaningless, political name, "Chicago Reformer!" Bah! The suggestion makes me weary.

And when, pray tell us, did the little mother hen draw in her wings and leave out in the cold any single reform subject? Not since I have known it, and that is a long time. And don't its editors, nearly every week, prune somebody down for getting too "long-winded" in their discussions? And then Livesey wants to "add to its present courage, business and horse-sense!" Truly the man is not nice. I would at least try to be courteous. I would not ask people to print a bold intimation that they themselves lacked sense! It seems to me the weekly appearance of the little paper all these years, through thick and thin, is sufficient evidence of the gray matter used in its management, and a lasting monument also of what a woman in freedom can do (this for you, dear Lillian).

Let these smart fellows unload themselves if they must. You just go ahead! You are all right. I could just slap some people—suggesting "horse sense" to Moses and Lillian Harman. I wish I had the part of that man's self-esteem that he don't need (I am only two in my chart). I don't see how any one can criticize the work of this strong, clean, sturdy little paper.

Sincerely thanking the writer of this letter for her defence of the name and the management of Lucifer I feel reasonably sure she misinterprets, in part at least, the suggestions of our phenomenally enterprising and able correspondent, Francis B. Livesey. If all of Lucifer's readers would and could be heard speaking for liberty and justice, through as many papers—daily, weekly and monthly, as is he of Sykesville, Md., there would soon be a quaking among the defenders of privilege such as was never known before, perhaps, in human history.

As to the NAME of our paper:

It is now nearly two years since the question of name was discussed, somewhat exhaustively, in our columns. Presumably Friend Livesey did not see that discussion, and to hundreds more of our later subscribers the reasons for adopting this name will be new and interesting. For this issue it is sufficient, perhaps, to refer our readers to Websters Unabridged Dictionary, edition of 1886, page 792. There the reader will find why and how it is that this most beautiful and suggestive, perhaps, of all the scientific names adopted from the Latin tongue, came to be used by the church as the synonym for the theologic concept of the

"Arch enemy of God and man." The definitions there given of LUCIFER and its cognate words, LUCID, LUCIFIC, LUCIFEROUS, LUCIFORM, etc., closing with this comment, make the best answer to our critics:

"The application of this passage in Isaiah [referring to Lucifer] to Satan and to the fall of the apostate angels, is one of those gross perversions of sacred writ which so extensively obtain, and which are to be traced to a proneness to seek for more in a given passage than it really contains—a disposition to be influenced by sound rather than sense, and an implicit faith in received interpretations."

Does not this rebuke apply with startling accuracy to the average Christian believer, whether minister, priest or layman?—"influenced by sound rather than sense, and an implicit faith in received interpretations."

With Professor Herron, and also with Dr. Hawley of Chicago, whose letter is given elsewhere, I recognize in the church—institutional Christianity—backed by organized capital, the real enemy of liberty and justice, and hence I welcome once more the opportunity of showing how the church has tried to disgrace and dishonor the best of all names for a paper whose object is to dispel the mists of ignorance, and to break the chains of superstition and mental slavery. M. H.

The Real Enemy.

Whatever may be said for or against the young journalistic giant, the "Chicago American," it must be said to its credit that it opens its columns to letters from the people; that it does not refuse to publish letters from unpaid correspondents that directly antagonize the utterances of the editor himself and his paid editorial writers. Almost without exception these editorials have denounced and defamed Prof. Herron. Less than one week ago, July 5, the editor's remarks on the "Baby Lions and Divorce," could have only one application, namely, to discredit the movement towards a more rational view of the duties and obligations of conjugal and parental life, as championed by Prof. Herron.

In its issue of July 8, under the head, "The Case of Dr. Herron," the "American" prints without comment, the following concise yet very comprehensive and unanswerable defense of the man who calls himself a REVOLUTIONIST, not simply a "reformer" of old social systems and superstitious customs:

W. R. HEARST, Editor "Chicago American"—Dear Sir:—The reaction which followed the inordinate praise accorded to Admiral Dewey showed how prone the American people are to unreasoning epidemics of sentiment. Is not the almost universal condemnation of Dr. Herron another instance? From the newspaper accounts one would suppose that he was the first man ever divorced, that his children were helpless infants abandoned to a dreadful fate, and that he is guilty of fearful crimes. The truth is that his divorce case is not unique, but cleaner than thousands which have occasioned little comment; that a splendid provision was made for his children, some of whom are nearly grown, and it has not been shown that his conduct has been criminal or even immoral.

In spite of the teaching of Christ, who said, "Let him who is without sin among you first cast a stone," regardless of the command to "judge not," the church has denounced, judged and condemned him. The press and the church and the people were unable to judge correctly without hearing both sides of the story. Possibly Dr. Herron could not defend himself without disparaging the mother of his children. Perhaps he is entirely blameless. It is not possible that interest in Dr. Herron's family actuated the attack. We have deserted mothers and abandoned children in want and shame and despair all about us. Moral lepers have been frequent enough among the clergy. What, then, was the motive? We think a pretext was seized upon by the church and the capitalistic press to ruin him, in order to cripple his power as a socialistic leader. He is able, therefore he must be destroyed—as lovers and emancipators of mankind have been all through the ages. Have his calumniators read his books? He may have erred or he may be in advance of his time and have done more nearly right than thousands who condemn him; but, be that as it may, and no man is capable of deciding, it seems to me impossible that any sane man can read Dr. Herron's works and believe him insincere. Even if he were guilty, Herbert Spencer says that the "faults of the advocate should not weigh against the thing advocated." The great common people, for whose welfare and advancement Professor Herron has given his life, ought to meditate profoundly on the wisdom of the above quotation, which has always been the reasonable defense of the church when one of its leaders went wrong.

Chicago, FRANK M. HAWLEY, M. D.

Contrast this manly and rational utterance from an unpaid layman, with the paid utterance of an editorial "Reverend," on the same subject, in the same paper, quoted by us a few weeks since, and the real source of danger to liberty and progress will need no better illustration. M. H.

The Wounded and Slain.

The Chicago "Daily News" of July 5, under the head "After the Battle," begins its reflections in this manner:

"The active efforts of the police officials, together with the caution enjoined by individual residents, seem to have been of some effect in diminishing Chicago's Fourth of July casuality list. No one was killed outright. The list, however, shows that 103 were injured, and as many of the wounds are serious it cannot be said that the day passed without fatal result. Elsewhere throughout the country the Independence Day celebrations seem to have been quite as deadly as ever, a partial enumeration of the returns from the entire country showing nineteen killed and more than 1,600 wounded."

Nineteen dead and sixteen hundred wounded seems a pretty big bill to pay for the sport of hearing a continuous roar of explosions, as of cannon and small arms, for the space of twenty-five hours or thereabouts. But when we add the injury done to invalids of sensitive nerves, by this incessant bombardment, the grand total of loss to health and life will be vastly increased. The Chicago "Record-Herald" of July 4, says that more than a dozen applications were made to Chief of Police O'Neill for protection, in behalf of the sick against the noise of the fireworks, and that in one case only was the request heeded. Two patrolmen were detailed to guard the home of "Col. John S. Cooper, former president of the County Democracy" who was suffering from an attack of pneumonia. The other applications were denied for the reason that "it was not a case of life and death with them," leaving the painful inference that if these sick and suffering ones had had a "political pull," such as an ex-president of the county Democracy may be supposed to have, they too could have had police protection against the outrage of having their nervous systems tortured and shattered by the near explosion of these relics of barbarism—fire-crackers, bombs, toy-cannons etc. M. WANTED: Names of women and men who READ, and who would possibly take interest in the work of Lucifer and its pamphlet literature. Each of our readers is acquainted, doubtless, with many who are willing to hear all sides, and who are not now subscribers to our weekly or monthly publications. Please send us their names, and if with the names a few stamps can be sent to cover cost of postage and time spent in mailing, the favor will be doubly appreciated. But don't forget to send the names. We need them NOW.

"Happiness is a way-side flower, growing along the walks of usefulness."

Light-Bearer Library No. 12.

The June number of our little monthly magazine marks the close of the first volume, new series. As stated last week, it has been thought best, on account of press of other work, to temporarily suspend the publication of the monthly. We still have a good supply of most of the back numbers, which can be sent to all applicants at five cents each or fifty cents per dozen. Of the last number, "Institutional Marriage," by M. Harman, an extra large edition has been issued, so that our subscribers may order duplicate copies, without charge if they so desire, to be used for missionary work among their friends; or, if they can use a dozen or more copies they will be supplied at half price, or thirty cents per dozen.

The next number of the Library will be issued January first of next year, provided there seems a sufficient demand for resumption of publication. Meantime those subscribers who prefer not to wait for such resumption, can have what is due to them in other literature, or in cash, if they so desire.

Ten Weeks for Ten Cents.

This seems the favorite method just now of extending Lucifer's circulation. As printed elsewhere in this issue, a subscriber in Dakota has sent within the past two weeks seventeen names, with the stamps, for the ten week trial list. Very few people are able to determine, from the reading of one or two numbers, whether they want the paper or not. In no way, as it seems to some of us, can our helpers do more effective work for radical reform—or rather for evolutionary and revolutionary human progress—than by spending a few stamps in sending Lucifer for ten weeks to friends whose minds are sufficiently awakened to see the evils of our present artificial and anti-natural social life, but who are in doubt as to where and how to make the needed changes.

If any friends cannot spare a dime for this purpose, send on the name or names without the dime, and we will send the paper for ten weeks to each new name, provided the sender will agree to see the person for whose benefit the trial is asked, in regard to it, or will write him or her if living at a distance from the sender.

The Arena for July

Contains, as leading articles:

Sweep and Meaning of The Last Century, by Prof. Frank Parsons, of Boston University.

Poverty and Social Decay, by Alfred Martin Colwick.

A College for the People, by Prof. Thomas E. Will, of Ruskin College, Trenton, Mo.

The Criminal Negro, by Francis A. Kellar of the University of Chicago.

An Artist with Twentieth Century Ideals, by B. O. Flower.

Topics of the Times, (Editorial) by B. O. Flower.

With the return of its old editor, B. O. Flower, the "Arena" seems itself again. It is now published by the Alliance Publishing Co., 569 Fifth Avenue, New York; price per annum $2.50, or twenty-five cents per number. For three dollars we will send Lucifer and the "Arena" for one year.

Up-to-Date Catechism.

What is the chief end of man?

To glorify the millionaire and billionaire trusts, and to serve them forever.

What is the chief end of woman?

To give birth to slaves for the worship and service of the holy trinity, God, Government and Grundy (priest, lawyer and "society" leader) and to glorify them forever.

What is the chief end of marriage?

To hold together those whom God—Nature—would put asunder; to breed hell in the home and criminals for the penitentiary and gallows—forever.

What is the chief end of the public schools?

To train children never to think for themselves but to think speak and act as others do—to be automatons—to worship the "state" (the political and judicial boss) and to serve it forever.

VARIOUS VOICES.

C. C. Fairchild, Calif.:—My subscription to Lucifer expired with number eight hundred and fifty-eight. Thanks for continuing sending them. I take a very great interest in reading your editorials; generally turn to them the first thing when I receive the paper. The article on the first page of 871, "True and False Morality," I think was splendid. Enclosed find $1 for Lucifer; twenty-five cents for the "Sanctity of Marriage," and twenty-five cents for "Woman in the Past, Present and Future," by August Bebel. Hoping Lucifer will keep up the good work she is doing until all woman-kind are freed from slavery.

Albina L. Washburn, Fort Collins, Colo.:—I have sold my lots in Loveland, and before buying elsewhere am waiting to hear if there are any colonies of our sort of people near to San Diego, Calif. I have written to several whose names I found in Lucifer, but as yet have no reply. If you have a list of such colonies at your pen's end, suppose you put it in Lucifer for me and other inquirers, soon as you can. I want your book when it comes out, for which I enclose a dollar.

[Will our friends who are interested in colonies, or groups of progressive people, write to Mrs. Washburn? Knowing so well what this noble woman has done and is doing for the advancement of radical reform work, and Lucifer's work especially, in Colorado and elsewhere, I would take it as a personal favor if our friends will respond promptly to this inquiry. M. H.]

I. E. Witman, Pa.:—You have stopped sending me Lucifer, for which I do not blame you, but really I want it; also the Light-Bearer monthly. I am not able now to remit you for same, but will do so within a month or two months at the latest. While I cannot indorse all your ideas, yet there is so much real good in your writings that I want them; besides you are brave, honest and earnest, and deserve encouragement and support. If we had more such people as you and your daughter this old world would be a desirable place to live in.

[We seldom cut off a regular subscriber until notified by the postmaster that the paper is refused. If the subscriber in arrears fails to get his paper and will notify us of his intention to pay when convenient, his name will be re-entered, but since it costs something to take a name from the list and then re-enter it, we earnestly request all to notify us before the expiration of the time paid for, that they wish the paper continued, and thus save us expense and trouble. M. H.]

Kate Austin, Caplingers Mills, Mo.:—I inclose one dollar on subscription to Lucifer, which I believe has just expired. I will thank you, this late in the day, for the square defense of Emma in regard to the "Truth Seeker's" criticism of her language. . . . You ask for opinions of Livesey's proposed plans to change Lucifer. I see no use to change the name; it is well known far and wide by the name with which it sprang into life. As for the date "E. M. 301," it is easy to reply to a curious inquirer that it dates from a certain act of the church—the reduction to a heap of ashes of one of the grandest men of history, because he dared question the dogmas of priestcraft. The Press Writers undoubtedly are a valiant host, but I see no special use of so much space being taken up to advertise their valor. Some of them seem to be in a trust to blow each others' horn. I was in a ring of press writers a year ago, till they dropped me out—why I don't know, unless it was because I did not pass "taffy" enough to go round. I was a little disgusted by one soliciting a brother member to write Mrs. Ingersoll for a donation of $25, because he was such a nice writer, and this member thought he was entitled to the donation because he had so ably defended R. G. Ingersoll in some of the secular papers. The member said he would write Mrs. Ingersoll. I never knew the outcome of it. Well, the world is full of queer people, and all not entirely good or bad. . . A nice row in the A. S. U.,—suppose you see by the "Blade." Well I never was a member and never will be. When I have a dollar to give to reform I can put it where it is needed, without calling on the services of middle men.

W. F., Dakota:—Commencing with your issue of June 15, please send the paper ten weeks to each of the following names. Mark with blue pencil the following articles: "Sex Starvation," in June 15; "Is Prostitution Necessary?" in June 22; "The Right Thing to Do When Married" and "A Private Agreement Between Central Lovers About to Adopt Legal Marriage," in June 29. The person last named in the list is a good circulator of literature and it is good policy to keep her supplied. Enclosed stamps, $1.70, to pay for same.

[Thirteen names of trial subscribers, for ten weeks, from one of our earnest and generous helpers, with $1.30 to pay for same, and forty cents extra—presumably to pay postage and trouble of marking and mailing back numbers, is very encouraging. Mid-summer, like mid-winter, is a season of comparative leisure for many people, and if our friends generally would adopt this plan of sending names of trial subscribers, ten weeks for ten cents, it would mean a boom for our summer campaign of agitation and education.

Since these lines were put in type W. F. has added the names of four more trial subscribers, accompanied with the stamps—$2.10 thus far as his July contribution to Lucifer's summer campaign of agitation and education. His previous record in the same line, extending for several years, would make interesting reading. With only two or three such workers in each state and territory, Lucifer would soon become a power for good such as it has never yet been. M. H.]

Cornelia Bœcklin, New Jersey:—if I were to write you every time I see something that I fully endorse in Lucifer you might be obliged to call a halt. The fact is I appreciate your paper, and would like now and again to write you words of commendation, but I always seem to have my hands full of work; but now I feel impelled to write you. In Lucifer No. 871 you ask: "Has any paper now in existence been more faithful to the underlying principles of human freedom and human justice than has Lucifer the Light-Bringer?" I am not acquainted with that paper. To run a paper to suit everybody would indeed be a herculean task and the man or woman that could accomplish that piece of work lives not. So let us try to make the most of the best we have.

I enjoy fully Francis B. Livesey's articles on the Press-Writers. Glad he seems to be working so enthusiastically in that direction. I do not endorse his proposition to change the name of the paper to "Chicago Lucifer," and worse yet to the "Chicago Reformer." Of course we all know that Chicago needs reforming badly enough, although possibly it is in no worse condition than hundreds of other cities. "Lucifer" seems to me to be a very good name. The paper has been running under that name for a number of years and why cannot it be the official paper under that name? Are radical people afraid of the name?

Many of Mr. Livesey's suggestions as to headings, long spun theories, etc., seem to me excellent. I was also much pleased with his remarks in a former number of Lucifer in regard to that nonsensical talk about putting up a monument to the memory of Ingersoll. As he well said to the leaders in that movement, "Don't, gentlemen, don't," when one realizes how poor, very poor, the radicals seem to be—cannot keep in flourishing conditions papers like "Liberty," Lucifer and "Discontent." Where is "Liberty" in these days? We have had a number of excellent papers in the days gone by. Some struggled along for shorter and others for longer periods of time, but all of them had to succumb for want of support, and there are persons calling themselves radicals that want to have thousands of dollars invested in a monument. Let us stand by one or two thoroughgoing radical papers. It would seem as if in such a "great," "glorious," "rich," "wonderful," country as we are told this is, that feat would be easily accomplished.

Let us see what the coming year will bring forth in the way of supporting radical papers, one or more.
